Whereas corporate investment, as is evidenced by the work of the organizations represented by the Fowler-McCracken Commission, has far-reaching implications for efforts to alleviate world hunger, both through direct involvement in national food systems and, more generally, through its impact upon employment levels, purchasing power, income distribution, balance of payments questions, and productivity in developing nations;

Whereas the most attractive countries for foreign investors remain the middle- and upper-income developing countries where rapid advances are being made in industrialization and the expansion of economic and social infrastructure; and

Whereas the less affluent developing countries have the greatest food problems—the critical lack of trained manpower and expertise and the need for farm-to-market roads, irrigation systems, communication networks, and newer port facilities—but offer little incentive for investment by foreign corporations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), that it is the sense of the Congress that in order to meet the challenge of encouraging private sector investment in developing countries and to target some of that investment so that it helps alleviate hunger, it is necessary to encourage the private sector to become involved with other nations wherever it can in the worldwide effort to alleviate hunger.

SEC. 2. It is further the sense of the Congress that, in light of the market for many developing country products, such investment by the private sector must be encouraged in order to promote income generation, improved natural resource management, and efforts to alleviate world hunger.

SEC. 3. It is further the sense of the Congress that—

(1) America's leading institutions in the public and private sectors should join forces, during this year and through the balance of this decade, in developing the commitments and the action plan essential to ending world hunger;

(2) the Fowler-McCracken Commission and other interested organizations should work together at the national, regional, and State level to build a national commitment so crucial to the success of this mission;

(3) such an undertaking should be designed to secure from private firms a commitment to a corporate agenda that reflects a resolve to end world hunger; and

(4) particular consideration should be devoted to mobilizing the public and private resources needed to assist the less-affluent developing countries in enabling their people to meet basic human needs.●

REDUCING AID TO ISRAEL IS NOT THE ANSWER TO DEFICIT DILEMMA

HON. JOHN McCAIN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, during the upcoming months of congressional debate on the fiscal 1986 budget, and on the necessity of reducing the deficit, I urge my colleagues to read the following article by Darrow (Duke) Tully, the publisher of the Arizona Republic.

The solution to our deficit does not lie in reducing aid to Israel. The one underlying truth which cannot and must not be forgotten while we attempt to solve our budget dilemma is that Israel has been and remains our one stable and solid ally in the Middle East.

The article follows:

REDUCING AID TO ISRAEL IS NOT THE ANSWER TO DEFICIT DILEMMA

The rising public outcry to reduce the federal deficit has given ammunition to those who would reduce the amount of aid to Israel.

It is axiomatic that protests rise in direct proportion to the number of people whose ox is being gored.

The president needs broad-based grassroots support to achieve cuts mandated by his re-election.

Syndicated columnist Donald Lambro pointed out in Arizona Republic that ". . . lawmakers are hearing three dominant messages from constituents: Americans don't want deep cuts in social safety-net programs, but they do want to cut wasteful spending in entitlement and other domestic expenditures.

"They don't want to weaken the nation's military capabilities, but they do want a dollar's worth of defense for every dollar spent.

"They don't want their taxes raised."

The largest entitlement programs are Social Security, Medicare and federal pensions. The administration will ask Congress for a one-year freeze in Medicare-payment rates for hospitals and doctors.

This has triggered charges that the administration is insensitive.

However, the administration is doing nothing more than trying to curb runaway medical costs.

The president has repeatedly attempted to change federal pension benefits to no avail. Opponents charge the administration with trying to punish federal workers.

That charge does not stand up to scrutiny when an examination of federal retirees shows more than 300,000 earning larger pensions than they were paid while working. Automatic annual increases tied to inflation is the culprit.

The defense budget has plenty of fat and can be trimmed considerably without harming our defense capability. Increased efforts to secure competitive bidding, elimination of cost overruns and changes in military retirement would produce substantial savings.

The next highest cost entitlement programs, ranking only slightly behind pensions, are food stamps and Aid to Families with Dependent Children. Both these programs have come in for criticism because of waste and abuse.

The U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service announced the implementation in Arizona of a program designed to weed out ineligible aliens from state and federal welfare programs. A similar program in California saved $59.3 million in 1984.

It seems myopic for opinion leaders to be harping so loudly about U.S. aid to Israel when we can see a dollar's worth of results for every dollar spent.

Harry J. Shaw, senior associate for the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, recently wrote in the Christian Science Monitor:

"The fiscal crisis ahead for the United States in the form of $200 billion deficits may have its own silver linings if we are wise enough to see them: a much-needed reexamination of the Reagan administration profligate defense program, and of America's role in the world. It will also offer an opportunity to cap the growth of military and economic aid to Israel and to reassess the premises of our relationship with Israel."

Hogwash!

The United States has one and only one stable ally in the Middle East, and that ally is Israel.

Shaw further stated, "If we increased aid for Israel, we would almost certainly have to increase our $2 billion aid to Egypt to maintain a certain balance in our relationships with both countries."

Poppycock!

What we really need to accomplish is a strengthening of economic ties between the two countries. Perhaps a "favored nations" condition on part of the aid for both, stipulating that a portion of the aid must be spent in trade between the two would be constructive. Economic ties would do a lot to encourage the peace process.

The United States must reassess priorities, but a decrease in aid to Israel is unthinkable at this time.●

STATEMENT ON LEGAL SERVICES FOR OLDER AMERICANS

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, the administration again has proposed in its budget for fiscal year 1986, as it did for fiscal years 1982, 1983, 1984, and 1985, to eliminate funding for the Legal Services Corporation. The resolution which Mr. BIAGGI is introducing today, and which I am supporting as an original cosponsor, is therefore particularly timely. What our resolution will do, if passed, is express the opposition of the House of Representatives to any reductions or alterations in the funding of the Legal Services Corporation which would reduce the availability of legal services provided to low-income older Americans through the Corporation's program.

Since its inception in 1975, the Corporation has provided invaluable legal services for low-income older people. In recent years, the Corporation's funds have assisted about 200,000 older persons annually. The problems on which the Corporation provides assistance reflect the complete range of legal difficulties which any citizen can encounter. For the people served by the Corporation, however, these difficulties are compounded by the special circumstances which our elderly and low-income citizens face. These run the gamut from will preparation and estate planning to difficulties encountered with such public benefits as those provided by the Food Stamp Program and the Social Security Administration. The Corporation's program provides assistance with consumer fraud problems, with difficulties encountered by frail older persons in nursing homes, with age discrimination problems encountered in the workplace.

It is very important that such direct legal services continue to be available to low-income older persons, and it is our hope that this resolution will contribute to that end.●

THE MALT BEVERAGE INTERBRAND COMPETITION ACT

HON. JACK BROOKS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Malt Beverage Interbrand Competition Act.

My bill merely clarifies existing Federal law by stating that nothing in the Federal antitrust statutes shall be construed to make unlawful the traditional practice of brewers and wholesalers entering into agreements giving wholesalers the exclusive right to sell a particular brand of malt beverage within a particular territory. This is consistent with Supreme Court rulings on the subject but needs statutory codification to prevent the ambiguities attendant with judicial rulemaking.

I emphasize that this legislation does not legalize the enforcement of price-fixing agreements, horizontal restraints of trade, or group boycotts. It does not mandate anything. It merely allows, as a matter of Federal law, territorial arrangements which have customarily been used in the industry. The States, however, as a matter of their own law, may provide otherwise. If any State finds these arrangements offensive or countercompetitive, they are free to outlaw them.

Contrary to past assertions, this bill is consistent with antitrust policy. It is likely to enhance competition in the malt beverage industry. Without the protection of these traditional territorial agreements which have characterized the industry, many feel that large distributors could easily skim off the most profitable and easily served retail outlets, leaving nothing of value to be handled by small local distributors. The result would be increasing concentration of market power in the few large distributorships at the expense of their smaller competitors.

Given the extensive review already given this legislation by Congress, I hope that the bill will receive expeditious consideration and I look forward to the support of my colleagues.

H.R. 1108

A bill to clarify the circumstances under which territorial provisions in licenses to distribute and sell trademarked malt beverage products are lawful under the antitrust laws

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Malt Beverage Interbrand Competition Act".

SEC. 2. Nothing contained in any antitrust law shall render unlawful the inclusion and enforcement in any written contract in effect on or entered into after the effective date of this Act by any brewer, importer, trademark owner, or trademark licensee of a trademarked malt beverage with any wholesale distributor of provisions granting the wholesale distributor the sole and exclusive right to distribute and to sell such product in any defined geographic area within any State and limiting such exclusive distributor to the distribution and sale, directly or indirectly, of such product only for ultimate resale to consumers within that defined geographic area when such product is in substantial and effective competition with other malt beverage products within that defined geographic area.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to legalize the enforcement of provisions described in section 2 of this Act in any written contract described in that section by means of price-fixing agreements, horizontal restraints of trade, or group boycotts, if such agreement, restraints, or boycotts would otherwise be unlawful.

SEC. 4. As used in this Act, the term "antitrust law" means the Act entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies" (Sherman Act), approved July 2, 1890, the Federal Trade Commission Act, approved September 26, 1914, and the Act entitled "An Act to supplement existing laws against restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes" (Clayton Act), approved October 15, 1914, and all amendments to such Acts.

SEC. 5. As used in this Act, "malt beverage" shall mean and include beer of all types and varieties as defined in any Federal or State statute, ale, porter, stout and all other similarly designated fermented beverages containing one-half of 1 per centum or more alcohol by volume.

SEC. 6. As used in this Act, the term "State" includes the District of Columbia and any territory or possession of the United States.

SEC. 7. This Act shall not invalidate or affect any provision of the laws of any State.●

HAPPY ANNIVERSARY, ELKS

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, February 16, 1985, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks will celebrate the 117th anniversary of the founding of this order.

Patriotism has been a hallmark of the Elks. In 1907, the Elks became the first fraternal organization in the Nation to mandate observance of June 14 as Flag Day. More than 40 years later, fellow Elk, President Harry S. Truman, signed into law a declaration naming Flag Day as an official national observance.

This year the Pittsburgh South Hills Lodge No. 2213 of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks has taken the lead in asking all to join in displaying the colors on February 16. I want, Mr. Speaker, to add my words of thanks to all Elks for the tremendous contribution they make to our communities. As contributers to so many important programs—cerebral palsy research, veterans hospitals, child care for the handicapped, Boy Scouts, Camp Fire Girls, and Little League—the 1.6 million American Elks have surely left their impact on our Nation.

Happy anniversary, Elks.

Mr. Speaker, for those not familiar with this great fraternal organization, I am delighted to present the following background piece on the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks:

THE ELKS

The Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks is one of the oldest and largest fraternal organizations in the United States.

The first formal meeting was held on February 16, 1868, in New York City. Fifteen persons turned out, most of them young, undiscovered but budding artists who had gathered for companionship and to help their other out-of-work peers.

The idea caught on and spread to other groups and other cities. As it grew, the new organization broadended is membership base to include businessmen, professionals, farmers and representatives from other occupations.

Today there are more than 1.6 million members of the Elks in 2,280 local "Lodges" found throughout all fifty states and the District of Columbia. Over the years, these Lodges have evolved into the primary building blocks of the highly decentralized Elks organization. They provide recreational facilities for the entire family, but the Lodges are also the focal point for the many community service and charitable programs that have become an Elk tradition.

Early in its history, the Elks supported groups such as the Salvation Army and the Red Cross. In 1871, they staged a benefit for the victims of the great Chicago fire. Money was raised for victims of the Seattle fire and the Johnstown flood in 1889. And the Elks were the first on the scene to supply money and rescue assistance during the San Francisco earthquake of 1906. Today, disaster relief continues to play an important part in Elk activities.

Patriotism has also been a hallmark of the Elks. In 1907, the Elks became the first fraternal organization in the nation to mandate observance of June 14 as Flag Day. More than 40 years later, fellow Elk, President Harry S. Truman signed into order a declaration naming Flag Day as an official national holiday.

The Elks National Foundation, the philanthropic arm of the organization, was created in July, 1928, as an income-producing fund to help support national Elk projects and to supplement programs at the state and local Lodge levels. Each year, scholarships are awarded to 500 outstanding high school students across the nation. Emergency educational grants are also provided to children of members who have died or been disabled.

Foundation support of state association projects is based on a "revenue sharing" concept. Funds are provided to each state in proportion to the level of contributions made by individuals in the state. The Elks contributed $26 million in 1983 to support cerebral palsy research, veteran's hospital, retarded child care and to provide wheelchairs,, recreational facilities and other aids to the handicapped.

The Elks devote a great deal of attention to youth programs. Lodges and individual members today sponsor more than 1,000 Boy Scout troops and 3,000 Little Leagues teams, as well as Boy's Clubs and Camp Fire Girls Clubs.

But one of the most important youth programs in recent years has been the annual "Elks' Hoop Shoot." * a national free throw shooting contest, for boys and girls from ages 8 to 13. Over three million youngsters from all fifty states participate yearly in the "Hoop Shoot" * from local contest to the national finals where six champions were named.

The program, begun in 1972 on a national basis, provides spirited competition and the chance for youngsters to develop new friendships. Winners and their families also travel to state, regional and national competition, courtesy of the Elks.●

CYPRUS COOPERATIVE DEVELOPMENT FUND

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to a resolution I have introduced today calling for the establishment of a Cooperative Development Fund on Cyprus to foster a climate of cooperation and peace between both communities of this troubled island. I am pleased to be joined in this effort by my colleagues, Mr. YATRON, Mr. TORRICELLI, Mr. GEKAS, Mr. MAVROULES, Mr. BARNES, Mr. GEJDENSON, Ms. SNOWE, and Mr. BILIRAKIS.

We are all well aware of the tragic situation that has plagued both Greek-Cypriots and Turkish-Cypriots for the past 10 years. Over a year ago, a Unilateral Declaration of Independence was declared which further solidified the partition of this important island. The conflict on Cyprus is not only detrimental to the Cypriots but is also damaging to our Nation's interests in the Eastern Mediterranean. A peaceful and fair solution to the Cyprus dispute will benefit all Cypriots and will also ease the divisions within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization [NATO], which currently weaken the southern flank of NATO, and help stabilize relations between the United States, Greece, and Turkey.

Through the initiative of U.N. Secretary General Perez de Cuellar, the leaders of the Greek-Cypriot and Turkish-Cypriot communities met, for the first time since 1979, in a January 17, 1985, summit to begin direct negotiations toward a settlement of the Cyprus dispute. The continuation of these negotiations encourages hope for resolving the divisions on Cyprus and for bringing peace to that long-troubled island. It is vital that our Nation do all that it can to encourage the continuation of dialog between the two sides.

Our Government can constructively support a solution of the Cyprus dispute by encouraging intercommunal understanding between the two parties and by assuring the Cypriots of U.S. support for cooperative efforts to rebuild a unified nation. For this reason, I have introduced this resolution calling for the establishment of a Cyprus Cooperative Development Fund similar to that passed by this body as an amendment to the 1985 foreign aid authorization bill in May 1984. This fund would provide financing for intercommunal projects, such as transportation projects, schools, and claim settlements, that would benefit both communities and that would foster a climate of cooperation and reconciliation. The projects would be outlined and approved by a joint commission of Greek-Cypriot and Turkish-Cypriot local authorities who would apply for funds after a project has been agreed upon. I am hopeful that this fund will stimulate the political will to pursue a settlement.

I am thankful for the support of the American Hellenic Educational Progressive Association [AHEPA] and for their valuable involvement in this issue, as exemplified by the 2-day conference they are hosting today and tomorrow relating to this issue. I urge the support of my colleagues in this worthwhile effort.●

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION FOR SECOND BAPTIST CHURCH

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, this spring, Second Baptist Church in Los Angeles, will commemorate the first century of their service to the community. The development of the church has its roots in the westward pioneer experience during the Reconstruction period.

On May 13, 1885, southern California's first black Baptist Church was organized. Of the three persons who started the church, only the name of the preacher is remembered, the Reverend S.C. Pierce. Along with his wife and one other person, Reverend Pierce organized Second Baptist Church. Reverend Pierce, a Texan, pastored the church for about 2 years, and was succeeded in 1887 by the Reverend C.H. Anderson.

The membership was 16 when Reverend Anderson came, but it soon grew to 22, and by 1887 the first church building was erected on Maple Street, between Seventh and Eighth. By 1892 the membership had grown to more than 130 and a two-story brick church building was erected on the Maple Street lot. A cornerstone was laid the same year.

The church grew to a membership of 500, and in 1907 the Reverend J.L. McCoy became pastor and led the congregation until 1915. Debts were paid on the new building, and finally the mortgage was paid. The congreagtion continued to grow, and plans were laid to build a new church office on 14th and Paloma.

The Reverend H.D. Prowd was the fourth pastor, serving from 1915-20. There was an influenza epidemic in 1918, and for 2 months no regular worship services were held. Reverend Prowd left Second Baptist to do missionary work in South America.

In September 1921, Dr. Thomas L. Griffith became the fifth pastor of the church. He was a native of Virginia and an alumnus of Virginia Union University.

Dr. J. Raymond Henderson was elected as sixth pastor of Second Baptist Church in March 1941, and his pastoral ministry continued through July 1963. Under the leadership of Dr. Henderson, the buildings now known as Henderson Community Center were purchased, the mission work of the church greatly expanded and the Velva Henderson Christian Education Building was erected.

October 20, 1963, marked the beginning of the pastorate of Dr. Thomas Kilgore, Jr., who is a personal friend of mine. Since that time, Dr. Kilgore has built solidly upon the foundation laid and perfected by the congregation and his predecessors. His commitment and devotion to our community is an inspiration to all of us. Some of the efforts which have come to fruition under the leadership of Dr. Kilgore include building Griffith Gardens; establishing the Second Baptist Children's Center; creating Kilgor Hill Retreat Center; and greatly expanding the support for missions and Christian education.

Mr. Speaker I want to pay special tribute to the legacy of Second Baptist Church and its strong spirit of sharing and dedication to the members of the Los Angeles community. Dr. Kilgore and his pastoral staff should all be commended for their special contributions during this centennial celebration.●

STRENGTHENING THE SINEWS OF SOUTH AFRICA'S BLACKS

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, legitimate leaders of the black population of South Africa have been bringing a constructive message to the American people in recent days. Chief Buthelezi of the Zulu nation has suggested that the only peaceful road to political power for blacks in South Africa must come through "strengthening the sinew" of the economy to provide economic clout. He suggests that this can best be accomplished through additional foreign investment and foreign economic assistance—not disinvestment and sanctions.

Proponents of sanctions surely realize that South Africa does not have the resources on its own to build that kind of strength among all peoples. If, as our colleague JACK KEMP suggests, growth produces equity here at home, the same is certainly true in South Africa as Chief Buthelezi argues.

Another legitimate leader is Lucy Mvubelo, general secretary of the National Union of Clothing Workers in South Africa. The Washington Times has done us a service by reprinting her introductory statements to Richard Sincere's book, "The Politics of Sentiment: Churches and Foreign Investment in South Africa." I recommend the positive humanitarian approach of both Chief Buthelezi and Mrs. Mvubelo to my colleagues in the present climate of discussion regarding the future of "constructive engagement."

I submit Mrs. Mvubelo's comments for the edification of my colleagues:

A VOICE FROM SOUTH AFRICA

(By Lucy Mvubelo)

SOWETO, South Africa.—The issue of external investment in South Africa is one that deeply affects all of us who live in this beautiful, paradoxical, and complex land. By the same token disinvestment will be felt by all of us—black, white, Asian, or colored.

The question also is important to Americans because it affects relations between the United States and South Africa, relations that in turn have an impact upon peace, prosperity, and stability throughout Africa.

I am a worker and trade unionist who knows how the ordinary African worker suffers under the discriminatory effects of apartheid in South Africa. I want fuller participation by my black co-workers and all groups in the economy and political system of my beloved country.

I have heard all the arguments and proposals for changing our internal situation through external pressures to isolate South Africa from the Western democracies, but I am not convinced.

To proponents of isolation, disinvestment, and embargoes, I must say: Don't break off contact, and don't advocate disengagement and withdrawal of foreign investments. Only indigenous movements—the trade unions, the political groupings, the schools, the business associations—within South Africa can bring about significant, positive change.

Outsiders can influence it, but only through participation, not by isolation.

Foreign investment has created jobs for thousands of African workers who would otherwise be unemployed. Thanks to the poiicies of foreign firms operating here, black workers have gained significant wage increases, often larger than the increases gained by black workers in South African companies. These workers enjoy the benefits of equal-opportunity codes adopted by American and European firms, whose example is now being followed by many South African companies.

The vitality of South Africa's economy offers more hope to South African blacks than destructive forms of pressure from abroad.

Unlike so many Africans throughout the continent and in South Africa itself who still live in dire poverty, middle-class blacks own a home, a television set, perhaps a car or a washing machine. These people, and others who aspire to a similar standard of living, now have a stake in peaceful reform, which does not mean they will not continue to agitate forcefully for their rightful voice in political, social, and economic affairs.

By insisting on the withdrawal of foreign companies—even of only American firms—disinvestment advocates are asking a substantial number of black workers to sacrifice their jobs, to sacrifice their only realistic means of attaining wider opportunities and higher living standards.

Christian churches in America and elsewhere outside South Africa have taken the lead in the international struggle against apartheid. Unfortunately, church leaders are often misguided and often ill-informed, and their statements and activities remain unexamined in light of the actual conditions in South Africa.

Those who insist that Christian vision requires them to support revolutionary change in South Africa fail to acknowledge any reform in South Africa and fail to see—or they turn a blind eye to—the effects violent revolution will have.

I hope that careful reflection will dissuade well-meaning, compassionate, and thoughtful Americans from pressing for shortsighted laws calling for divestment and disinvestment.

Such laws will set back the cause of human rights and peaceful change. They will hurt the South African economy and the very persons their advocates seek to help.●

IN SUPPORT OF LEGAL SERVICES PROGRAM FOR SENIORS UNDER THE LEGAL SERVICES CORPORATION

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation, along with my colleague, Ms. SNOWE, that would express the sense of Congress that funding for the Legal Services Corporation should be continued.

In the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1986, once again, we see that the Corporation is slated for elimination. As chairman of the Select Committee on Aging's Subcommittee on Human Services, I have actively fought to secure continuation of LSC-funded programs for they form the base of support for legal services for seniors.

In addition to opposing budget cuts, our subcommittee has waged a bipartisan effort to reverse regulations promulgated by the LSC in November 1983 which restrict client eligibility by imposing asset tests in addition to means tests as a prerequisite for services. This two-pronged attack on legal services—by reducing dollars and restricting eligibility—has had a serious effect on the volume of service provided to the elderly.

We have continued to monitor the effects of these November 1983 regulations on programs around the country. To date, the information we have received from legal services providers points to reduced availability of staff for assisting clients—and more time being spent complying with the new regulations. Clearly, to reduce or eliminate funding for the Corporation at a time when resources are being stretched to the limit is at the very least, unacceptable.

Since fiscal year 1981, the administration has proposed to eliminate funding for the Corporation, despite the important role the Corporation plays in the provision of services to the elderly and handicapped.

In 1981, funding for the Corporation was reduced by 25 percent to $241 million from a high of $321 million the previous year. This resulted in the closing of 300 local offices and the loss of 1,773 attorneys, at a time when the number of eligible elderly had increased over 14 percent. In an effort to reverse this decline in funding, and in recognition of the continued importance of the LSC, last year, Congress provided a $35 million increase over the previous year.

We have introduced this resolution in order to send a clear signal to those who fail to see the value of the Corporation in providing important services to the elderly. Failure to continue these programs would not only deny access to justice to a large number of needy seniors—and handicapped individuals—it would also place an added burden upon other programs, such as the Older Americans Act, to provide services. Today, 20 percent of all Older Americans Act legal services programs are supported by the LSC. Elimination of this important supplemental funding source would place added pressure on area agencies on aging to direct other service dollars into legal services, in order to assure the availability of services, as required by law.

I hope that our colleagues will join with us in this bipartisan effort to fight efforts to eliminate funding for the Legal Services Corporation and join us in cosponsoring this initiative.●

NATIONAL DES AWARENESS WEEK

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a resolution today to designate the week of April 21, 1985, "National DES Awareness Week."

Diethylstilbestrol [DES], a powerful synthetic hormone, was given to an estimated 3 million women in the United States from 1941 to 1971 for the purpose of reducing complications in childbirth. Some women were also encouraged to take the drug under the pretense that it helped make healthy babies healthier. Prescription was continued despite reports in the early 1950's that the drug was ineffective.

It was not until early 1971 that use was banned by the Food and Drug Administration when medical research revealed a strong connection between DES and cancer of the reproductive organs. More recent studies have linked DES to cancers and abnormalities in mothers, daughters, and sons.

According to recent studies, women who took DES 20 or more years ago are 40 percent more likely than other women their age to develop breast cancer. Figures show that DES has been linked to about 25,000 cases of breast cancer. "DES thus becomes the major environmentally identified cause of breast cancer," according to Dr. Sidney M. Wolfe, director of the health research group, a branch of Ralph Nader's Public Citizen.

DES daughters have been shown to be at the greatest risk from the drug. Studies reported in 1971 established a definite connection between DES before birth and an increased risk of a rare form of cancer in young women. A surprising number of cases of clear-cell adenocarcinoma were reported by 1980. Adenosis, abnormal growths or structural changes in the reproductive tracts, which may be the basis for clear-cell adenccarcinoma, may be experienced by up to 90 percent of DES daughters. Additionally, DES daughters experience more difficulties than average women during their own pregnancies, according to findings outlined in a January 25, 1980, Washington Post article.

Recent studies have shown an increased rate of reproductive and urinary tract abnormalities in the sons of women who took DES during pregnancy. Further studies are being conducted to investigate a link between DES and increased rates of genital herpes or infertility in young men.

In the late 1970's, the National Cancer Institute coordinated a public education program to publicize the health risks associated with DES. This program, though well implemented, was unsuccessful in reaching the many women and their children requiring special medical attention. Doctors have had difficulty reaching women who were patients up to 40 years ago. Many of the women affected are unfamiliar with the drugs prescribed to them. Some are not aware that this drug may now be affecting their sons and daughters.

It is imperative that the women who took DES during pregnancy and their daughters and sons be made aware of the effects of the drug to which they have been exposed. Early detection and treatment are necessary to contain these cancers, and preserve the reproductive capabilities of its victims.

I propose that the week of April 21, 1985, be dedicated as a time to further the effort to locate and educate the many women and men who have no knowledge of their exposure to this potentially dangerous drug. Senator RIEGLE of Michigan is introducing a companion resolution in the Senate. I invite all Members to join in cosponsoring this most important effort.●

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege for me to join once again in the annual observance of Black History Month which begins this week. I am especially proud of the celebrations that are taking place in the State of New Jersey and in the 10th Congressional District this month to pay tribute to the many contributions that blacks have made to the culture and history of America.

This is a time of celebration, of education, and of rededicating ourselves to the goals of racial equality and equal justice for all. I think it is also a time to look back on our achievements, and look ahead to the struggles we still must face. Ms. Irene Hill Smith, president of the New Jersey chapter of the NAACP, recently was quoted as saying, "I hope that when my grandchildren are in school, black history will be so much a part of American history that it will no longer be necessary to have a monthly observance."

Black History Month reminds us of how far we have come, but also of how far we must go before we truly reach the "sunlit path of racial justice." This year the struggle for civil rights has continued, not just in our own country but around the world. When we consider the fight for civil rights we must not ignore the situation that exists in South Africa, where the repugnant doctrine of apartheid continues to deprive basic human rights to a majority of people. The daily protests outside the South African Embassy are testimony to our commitment to bringing freedom and equality to the people of that country.

We are only 1 year away from when we will officially commemorate the birthday of Dr. Martin Luther King as a national holiday. After working so long and hard to pass the legislation designating Dr. King's birthday as a holiday, let us not lose sight of the goals he stood for. Let us look to the day when his dream is finally realized. During this time of reflection, we should remember that they shot down the man, but they could not shoot down his dream, a dream that was stronger than life and more powerful than death.

This year, as we look back to the achievements we have made in the past few decades, let us also look to the struggles that lie ahead. We recall with pride landmark legislation such as the Civil Rights Act, the Voting Rights Act, the Fair Housing Act, nutrition and education programs, and legal services for the poor, to name but a few. But we still must work to preserve and defend these programs from continued attack. We must protect our hard-won victories and continue the steady march toward equal opportunity in our society for all.

This year, we look forward to enactment of the Civil Rights Restoration Act, which will close any loopholes in the civil rights laws and guarantee that their antidiscrimination provisions are applied broadly, as they were originally intended.

The State of New Jersey, having officially designated February as Black History Month, has planned numerous events such as lectures, exhibits, and musical events. On Monday, February 11, Newark's Mayor Kenneth Gibson will officially open the Third Annual Black History Exhibit in the city hall rotunda with his proclamation of Black History Month. The exhibit has as its theme "Black Labor in Struggle—The Backbone of America." An exhibit opened this week at the Newark Museum entitled "Ritual in African Life," which focuses on a variety of masks, sculptures, and other adornments that were part of ritual and ceremony in Africa.

In addition, there will be a variety of events held at the Newark Museum, including a lecture by prominent author Maya Angelou on Sunday, who will discuss highlights of her life and career. Various lectures, seminars, art exhibits, and musical events are scheduled at Rutgers University at Newark, Essex County College, and the New Jersey Institute of Technology as well. A number of well-known musicians will be performing in the Newark area during Black History Month, highlighted by yesterday's special appearance by pianist and singer Nina Simone at Newark's Symphony Hall.

East Orange High School will be holding a lecture by television newsman Gil Noble on Saturday, and a variety of other events are planned in the city by Mayor Thomas Cooke.

Mr. Speaker, the month of February holds special meaning for all of us as we commemorate Black History Month. I salute all of the participants of this memorable celebration. And all of us as citizens of this great country should feel a sense of pride in doing so.●

THE EMERGENCY AGRICULTURAL CREDIT ACT OF 1985

HON. E. THOMAS COLEMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, when the cornerstone of a foundation becomes unstable, it will cause the entire structure to come toppling down. Agriculture, the cornerstone of our economy, is in such bad shape right now that our entire Nation is at risk.

The agricultural economy is not enjoying the economic recovery like other sectors of the economy. In fact, farmers are faced with such high interest rates, declining land values, and low returns for their products that they are reliving the Great Depression of the 1930's.

Before I risk losing the interest of my urban colleagues, let me further state that his farm depression could very well ripple throughout our economy. Fully 22 percent of our Nation's work force—22.7 million people—work in agriculture-related industry. Their future, as well as that of 3 million American farmers, is at stake.

I am very supportive of the President's debt restructuring program and the most recently announced changes that provide for a write down of principle and for interest on outstanding loans. This change will allow banks to participate in the guarantee program who were precluded before due to the capital reserve requirements caused by the 10-percent write down of principle. I feel the President's program is a positive step to help farmers manage their existing debt load. But, I feel there are several issues not addressed by the President's debt restructuring program. Today, I am introducing legislation to bring immediate relief to credit-strapped farmers who are in need of new loans for this spring's planting. My bill has a three-fold purpose. First, it will encourage lending institutions to make spring operating loans available to farmers by providing a federally guaranteed loan for the 1985 crop year. Second, my bill will provide special assistance, in the form of low interest Farmers Home Administration operating loans, to farmers who have experienced weather-related disasters in at least 3 out of the past 5 years. And, third, my bill directs the Secretary of Agriculture to provide more field personnel to help relieve the backlog of FmHA applications.

These measures are needed in Missouri and throughout our rural heartland so that farmers can work their way out of this financial crisis.

The depressed agricultural economy has caused tremendous stress on agricultural banks and other agricultural lenders. As a result, many banks are not in a position to make new agriculture loans or to extend previously made loans. Last year, 79 commercial banks were liquidated nationwide. Of the 43 liquidated in the first half of 1984, only 7 were considered agricultural banks. But, in the second half of the year, 23 out of the 36 liquidated banks were agricultural-oriented institutions. In this climate, banks are very reluctant to make more loans to farmers. An informal survey of some farm-State banks by the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City shows that up to 15 percent of farmers in that region won't get the loans they need to plant their crops this spring.

My bill will help farmers get their operating loans in time for spring planting by offering a 75 percent Federal loan guarantee to the lender. Rather than going through the time-consuming and backlogged FmHA procedures, private lenders will make their own lending decisions. Lenders will determine if the borrower has adequate repayment ability and can make a positive cash flow. I believe that wise and prudent decisions will be made by lenders when approving loans because 25 percent of a loan's value will not be Government guaranteed.

Yes; lenders will have a tremendous responsibility on their shoulders to approve loans without the blessing of the Farmers Home Administration. But, FmHA has loan applications backlogged to the point where the lending programs have ground to a halt. In Missouri alone, 5,594 out of the 6,241 applications received by FmHA for the President's Debt Setaside Program were still pending as of December 31, 1984. In addition to that, there were 836 of the 901 disaster loan applications pending throughout the State. This doesn't even take into account the number of farm ownership loans, operating loans, and rural housing loans pending in county offices. It is critical that farmers have operating loans approved within the next 60 days and with a backlog like this, there is no way FmHA officials can get them approved in time for spring-planting decisions. That is why my bill places the decisionmaking responsibility on lenders.

The second part of my bill provides FmHA operating loans at a reduced interest rate for farmers in designated natural disaster areas for at least 3 out of the past 5 years. The current emergency disaster loan programs only allow farmers to receive a low-interest loan for losses experienced as a result of a natural disaster. According to USDA officials, it takes farmers 3 years to recover from one natural disaster. For two consecutive disasters, it takes a farmer 7 years to financially recover, and for 3 years, it obviously takes even longer.

Therefore, farmers in areas plagued with consecutive natural disasters should receive special assistance for operating loans in order for them to get back on their feet quicker. The current interest rate for an FmHA operating loan is 10.25 percent. My bill would allow farmers who have been plagued by disaster to receive an FmHA operating loan for 3 percent below the interest rate of a regular FmHA operating loan, or 7.25 percent based on today's interest rates. Of course, the rate of FmHA operating loans fluctuates according to the cost of acquiring funds. Even though the borrower will receive a reduced interest rate for his operating loan, he must still meet other FmHA requirements for such a loan.

The third section of my bill would direct the Secretary of Agriculture to provide adequate manpower to FmHA offices to help with backlogged loan applications. Every year, farmers borrow money to plant their spring crops. I don't understand why FmHA can't gear up to provide adequate manpower in order to get loans processed by spring planting time. National tax preparation firms know that taxes have to be paid by April 15, and they plan ahead to accommodate the increased workload. FmHA should, likewise, be able to anticipate and prepare for the annual spring operating loan season.

The farm credit crisis has been receiving widespread attention in the past few weeks. While the Midwest has felt the immediate impact of this crisis, the ripple effect will soon filter to our urban areas. I cannot emphasize enough that this is not just a rural problem. Nor is it a Democrat or Republican problem. We must work together in a bipartisan effort to help relieve this farm credit crisis.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, and from both urban and rural areas, to join with me in support of this legislation. Only through a united effort can we reinforce American agriculture—the cornerstone of our economy.●

PROPOSED TAX REFORM LEGISLATION

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I have received an excellent letter of January 22 from my friend and fellow Kentuckian, Gene M. Pope, of Harpring & Pope, Chartered Financial Consultants, located in Louisville, KY. Gene Pope and I graduated together in 1955 (almost 30 years ago) from Eastern High School in Louisville's suburbs.

I believe my colleagues will be interested in Mr. Pope's thoughts concerning the tax reform legislative proposals that might be considered during the 99th Congress. I hope my colleagues will note his concern that legislative review must be made "with the objective of tax simplification and with the understanding that major changes do not in themselves promote fairness or equity among taxpayers."

Gene Pope's letter is as follows:

HARPRING & POPE,
CHARTERED FINANCIAL CONSULTANTS,
Louisville, KY, January 22, 1985.

Congressman CARROLL HUBBARD,
204 Cannon House Office Building,
Washington, DC

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HUBBARD: It is obvious that in the next session of Congress one of the major pieces of legislation up for consideration will be tax reform I understand there are as many as 38 tax reform proposals being promoted by various members of Congress. There is no doubt that tax reform is desirable. Too often in the last 10 or so years Congress has either thrown the baby out with the bath water or used a hammer to kill a gnat. They have simply added to the complexity of the law without significant benefit either to the public interest or to the Federal Treasury. They have created an administrative and record keeping nightmare that makes it impossible for the most diligent taxpayer to properly complete his tax return or adequately keep required records. The most recent IRS regulations on automobile business use is an example.

I realize it is difficult with the number of pieces of legislation proposed to explore in great depth the impact of any of these proposals. I simply urge you to review these proposals with the objective of tax simplification and with the understanding that major changes do not in themselves promote fairness or equity among taxpayers but simply distort or destroy financial plans that were adopted in good faith by taxpayers based upon the tax law at the time of their adoption. Many of the proposals would have the effect to destroy private initiative toward personal financial security by removing tax benefits designed to promote personal thrift and family security through the purchase of personal life insurance. Others would destroy tax incentives or provide medical and retirement benefits for their employees. Without that incentive many employees would be left to depend on government programs as they could not adequately provide these benefits for themselves. I recognize and desire equitable tax treatment of all taxpayers, but I also support the concept that tax incentives that encourage the general welfare are more efficient then governmental programs that provide for the bureaucracy instead of the public. I strongly urge you to seek a balanced budget, control government spending and reduce the deficit by raising revenue, if necessary, but not at the expense of long established programs designed to promote personal thrift and personal responsibility for one's financial security.

Sincerely,

GENE M. POPE, CLU, CPCU, ChFC.●

MAY 7, 1985—HELSINKI HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, my colleague TOM LANTOS and I introduced a resolution designating May 7, 1985, as Helsinki Human Rights Day. As cochairmen of the congressional human rights caucus, we are pleased that over 70 of our colleagues have joined us in cosponsoring this resolution which recognizes the importance of respect for human rights.

On August 1, 1975, representatives from 35 countries joined together in Helsinki, Finland, to sign the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. This agreement, referred to as the Helsinki Accords, covers every aspect of East-West relations, including military security, scientific and cultural exchanges, trade and economic cooperation, and human rights.

The year 1985 marks the 10th anniversary of the signing of the accords. The signing of this agreement triggered the hopes of many people living in countries who believed that it signaled a new era of respect for human rights and improved East-West relations. In many countries Helsinki monitoring groups were established with the purpose of publicizing the standards of the accords and monitoring the application of these standards by their governments. Unfortunately, the formation of these groups were not encouraged by many countries. In fact, most of the groups in Eastern Europe met great opposition from their governments. The leaders of these groups, who persisted in their cause despite the efforts by their governments to jail them and to disrupt the meetings, are truly world leaders in the fight for human rights.

Recently I became involved in the plight facing one member of the Helsinki monitoring group in Czechoslovakia, Charter 77. Rudolf Battek has long served as a spokesman in the human rights movement in his country, and as a result of his efforts has spent several years in prison. He is currently serving a prison sentence for publishing an essay on political pluralism. I met with Czech embassy officials and spoke of my concern that Mr. Battek has been imprisoned solely for expressing his political beliefs. The officials disagreed with me, and said that Mr. Battek is guilty of receiving money from unspecified foreign governments for his writings, apparently making free expression a crime under their law. Mr. Battek's experiences in Czechoslovakia are not unique. From the Soviet Union frequently come similar stories. Andrei Sakharov is probably the most well-known member of the Helsinki monitoring group in the Soviet Union—and we in the West are very familiar with his fate of internal exile and constant persecution in Gorky.

By sponsoring a resolution to call attention to the Helsinki Accords we hope to remind the members of the Helsinki monitoring groups, and foreign governments, that the United States continues to support full implementation of the accords. It is my hope that we can encourage people like Rudolf Battek and Andrei Sakharov to continue their efforts to work for the fundamental freedoms agreed to by their governments.

May 7, 1985, was selected as Helsinki Human Rights Day to coincide with the commencement of a meeting of experts in Ottowa to discuss the human rights provisions of the accords. We believe that it is important for the President to use this meeting as an opportunity to reassert the U.S. commitment to the Helsinki Accords. Our resolution calls upon the President to issue a proclamation stating our country's support for the human rights provisions of the accords and encouraging all signatory nations to abide by their obligations under this agreement.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting Helsinki Human Rights Day. I hope that through our efforts to support the Helsinki Accords we can work for a new beginning of international peace and respect for human rights.●

CHANGE U.S. PATENT LAW

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a bill I am introducing today that, if enacted, will be of considerable benefit to our country because it will close a damaging loophole in U.S. patent law. A similar bill passed the House on suspension last year and was favorably reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee. Under existing conditions, a patent is infringed only if the patented product or process is used, made, or sold in the United States. This is sufficient in the case of a product patent because any item produced overseas and sold in the United States effectively infringes on the patent holder's rights.

However, in the case of a process patent there is no effective way by which a patentee can prevent a firm from duplicating and using the protected process overseas and then selling the product of that process in the United States.

Process technology is important in the biotechnology industry, the electronics industry, and the pharmaceutical industry, among others. Recent examples of infringing imports involving process technologies including fiber optics and amorphous metals. During the last Congress we received many letters of support, one from the American Flint Glass Workers Union stating that they believed inadequate process patents protection has cost their industry alone upward of 50,000 jobs.

If a firm's investment is undercut in such a manner, it has two unreliable options available to protect its patented process from abuse overseas:

First, it can seek to obtain a patent in as many foreign countries as possible and then sue for infringement of its foreign patents in foreign courts when the process is used to make products which are then sold in the United States. This option is very inadequate because it is expensive and it is impossible to obtain effective protection in all of the countries in which the process might be used.

The other option open to the patentee is to seek relief from the International Trade Commission. While damages are not available to a patentee under the appropriate section of the United States Code, a patentee can seek a cease and desist order against a particular firm. Such an order may be issued by the Commission if it finds that the firm is violating or believed to be violating the pertinent section of the code. The patentee can also seek an exclusion order that would bar the importation of products made by this patented process if the Commission finds violation, again of the appropriate code section.

However, these options are not very helpful in providing the patent holder with adequate and fair protection because to obtain a cease and desist order or an exclusion order, a patentee must show not only the importation of a product made by his patented process, but also that the effect or tendency of such importation is to destroy or substantially injure a U.S. industry. Moreover, cease and desist orders against particular firms may not be effective where importation of offending products can easily find alternative channels.

And enforcement of exclusion orders by customs officials is complicated by the difficulty of identifying which products were made by patented processes and which were not. Thus, it is very difficult for a process patentee to obtain effective protection under current law where his patented invention is practiced overseas and the resulting product sold in the United States. This legislation will stop foreign competitors from taking a free ride on U.S. research at the expense of the U.S. patent owner.

Sections 2 and 3 of the bill make it a patent infringement to import into the United States, or to use or sell in the United States, products produced by a patented process. Section 4 exempts from liability for monetary damages infringers other than manufacturers who lack knowledge or notice of the infringement. Section 5 places the burden of establishing that the product was not produced by the patented process on the alleged infringer in certain circumstances. Section 6 makes the bill applicable to products produced or imported after the date of enactment.

This legislation will provide an injured U.S. company with a fair and reasonable opportunity to protect their local markets from this sort of international piracy.●

RESPONSE TO THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET—EFFECTS ON HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, the President's proposed budget is an assault on the Nation's health and social service delivery capability. Proposed cuts would sabotage the gains we have made in medical research and social service and undermine our future ability to reduce suffering and improve the health and welfare of every American.

The proposal undercuts the basis of our health care system; the excellent basic and applied research that have been the products of The National Institutes of Health and Mental Health. It calls for a 5.5-percent cut in the NIH overall budget and reduces the number of grants appropriated in the fiscal year 1985 budget by 1,500 and the number of research centers by 48. This action compromises our ability to keep talented investigators in the health research field, resulting in the loss of core personnel on major research projects. Further assaults on the Nation's ability to produce clinical and research personnel comes from the administration's proposal to eliminate $25 million of direct Federal support of health care professions. Additional cuts include $22 million for NIMH clinical training programs. The administration rationalizes these cuts by stating that the supply of health care professionals is adequate, ignoring the needs for minority health providers and professionals to work in underserved urban and rural communities.

the budget proposal decreases service to vulnerable populations, increasing their health risk. The administration would cut $5 million from the TB control grants and $5 million from the highly effective diabetes control programs. In addition, the attempt to consolidate migrant health, black lung clinics, community health centers, and family planning programs under a primary care grant would further undermine our commitment to provide direct services to underserved groups in community based settings, as would a $37 million cut in the Indian Health Program.

The administration proposes to add to the already overburdened Social Service block grant commitments by cutting out the $368 million for community services block grants and $13 million for the Community Service Program. In addition, development of child welfare service models could be severely curtailed if the cut of $3.6 million in child welfare research and $7 million in child abuse discretionary funds are allowed to stand.

As a member of the Health and Human Services Appropriations Subcommittee, I promise to review the President's budget proposal closely and insure that our health and social service research and service delivery are not compromised. It is clear that we must deal with the problem of the deficit but must draw up a plan with priorities that reflect our commitment to health and human decency.●

ENDANGERED SPECIES ACT REAUTHORIZATION

HON. JOHN B. BREAUX

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to extend the authorization for funds to be appropriated under the provisions of the Endangered Species Act for an additional 4 fiscal years. The bill will serve as a vehicle for hearings on the act that we have scheduled for March.

The current Endangered Species Act was enacted in 1973 to address the concern of scientists and naturalists that the rate of species extinctions was increasing rapidly and a number of very visible species, such as the bald eagle and the brown pelican, were threatened with extinction. Although the publicity surrounding endangered species has focused on the more glamorous species such as the bald eagle, scientists are perhaps more concerned about the loss of biological diversity caused by the increased rate of extinction of both plants and animals. They point to the loss of genetic traits that could provide advances in medicine or agriculture. They argue that, while it is inevitable that we will continue to manipulate and develop natural resourses, the first rule of intelligent tinkering is to save all the pieces.

The act, which has been amended several times, most recently in 1982, requires the Departments of Commerce and Interior to study wildlife and plant species that fall within their jurisdiction to determine if they are in danger of extinction. Species determined to be in such danger are placed on the endangered species list. Species likely to become endangered unless protective actions are implemented are listed as threatened. In 1982 the act was amended to require the agencies to respond to private citizen petitions to list species in a timely manner.

Once listed, a species is protected from taking and eligible for other protective measures provided under the provisions of the act. Perhaps the most important provision, and certainly the most controversial, is section 7 of the act, which requires Federal agencies, prior to undertaking any Federal activity, to consult with the Commerce or Interior to ensure that their actions are not likely to jeopardize the continued existance of any endangered or threatened species. This is the section that was involved in the famous controversy between the snail darter and the Tellico Dam. Although section 7 has been amended several times to improve coordination among agencies and provide for Cabinet level review of irreconcilable conflicts between endangered species and Federal projects, it is still one of the strongest provisions in the body of wildlife conservation law.

Since its enactment, there have been both successes and failures. The bald eagle has come back, the whooping crane has made progress and the brown pelican has recently been removed from the endangered list on the east coast. There have also been failures. There are only five dusky seaside sparrows left, all in capivity and all, unfortunately, male. The California condor has continued its decline. The red wolf is probably extinct in the wild, although they are breeding in zoos.

We will take a close look at the act when we hold hearings in March. When we last considered the act in 1982, I was impressed by the willingness of both environmental and development interests to compromise and work toward making the act more effective and more workable. I think we all agree the end product was a reasonable set of amendments to the act that, we hope, made it work better for all concerned.

I hope we can approach this reauthorization with the same commitment to a rational process where we concentrate on the facts and resolve conflicts with patience and compromise. If we do this, I am certain we can achieve the consensus on this issue that we have in the past.●

NICARAGUA

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, the propaganda mills are at work in the U.S. and abroad. The Nicaraguan Embassy and even some in the U.S. media would have us believe peace and freedom can be secured in Central America by allowing Marxist forces to seize and keep power through violence, not the ballot box.

The consequences of a Marxist guerrilla victory in El Salvador and throughout the region are too great. Indeed, the security of the Western Hemisphere is at stake. Despite this frightening reality, it seems we have not been able to get this message across to the people.

Let's look at the facts:

While critics fret at 55 U.S. advisers in El Salvador, they somehow forget 9,000 Cubans in neighboring Nicaragua.

They forget that Nicaragua maintains a military force greater than the forces of all of its neighbors combined—more than would ever be needed solely for defense;

That one-fourth of the Nicaraguan coast's 165,000 Indians are in relocation and refugee camps; that one-half of the Miskito and Sumo Indian villages have been destroyed;

That the only remaining nongovernment Nicaraguan newspaper, La Prensa, is censured daily; and

That opposition parties are denied free participation in elections.

Is this really what we should support in Central America?

With the facts on the table, there is no doubt that the American people will support the cause of freedom in Central America.●

JOSEPH MEYERHOFF

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that I inform the House of Representatives of the death of Joseph Meyerhoff. This man truly left an indelible mark on Baltimore and on the world community. I join with my friends in Maryland and around the world to mourn his passing.

A lawyer and a real estate businessman, Mr. Meyerhoff built more than houses. He helped build a better Baltimore. Among his other projects, he built Baltimore's Showpiece Symphony Hall and an orchestra worthy of the place. Mr. Meyerhoff was president of the board of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra for 17 years. During his tenure he helped mold the orchestra to one of international repute. He often joked that it was his wife who convinced him to come to the rescue of the fledgling orchestra. But once involved, Joseph Meyerhoff threw himself into the task of educating himself about music, orchestras, and concert halls, and transformed the cultural world of Baltimore by giving it a world class orchestra and the symphony hall which bears his name. This exemplifies the celebrated Meyerhoff style: The mastery of a situation followed by the infusion of his time, energy, creativity, and the money necessary to implement improvements.

Mr. Meyerhoff came to America as a Russian Jewish immigrant. His father ran a meat market. The story of Joseph Meyerhoff is more than that of a Horatio Alger. This man never foregot his past, his roots. He shared his fortune for the betterment of the city he loved and the people he cared about.

Joseph Meyerhoff served on the boards of Baltimore's Provident Hospital, which serves the black community, and Sinai Hospital. He built houses, apartment buildings, and shopping centers, creating jobs and economic opportunities. He was a life member of the Board of the National Home Builders Association. He generously contributed scholarship support to Johns Hopkins University. The Meyerhoff legacy extends all over Maryland.

Joseph Meyerhoff loved Israel and helped the country move from a dream into a political reality. He helped establish the United States-Israel bond movement which raised billions of dollars for industrial development in Israel. He was a member of the executive committee of the United Jewish Appeal helping settle Jewish refugees in Israel. His support of Israel also reached to schools, museums, libraries, and cultural centers.

The list of his involvements and his accomplishments is endless. As the Representative of the Third Congressional District of Maryland, I personally knew Mr. Meyerhoff and his family. Joseph Meyerhoff always gave more than his name and his money; he responded to needs with energy, leadership, and generosity. He truly believed in the future of Baltimore and the hope of Israel, and worked to realize those visions.

Joseph Meyerhoff was a husband, a father, a grandfather, a friend, a philanthropist, an active and caring citizen. Mr. Meyerhoff once said, "once you've taken care of your children and your grandchildren, what are you going to do with your money? Why not do what you can to help make life a little richer for others?" We have all benefited from the life and spirit of Joseph Meyerhoff. He will be sorely missed.●

FUSION ENERGY RESEARCH

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, following is a joint resolution urging formation of a national policy and renewal of national attention on the future of fusion energy research, technology and development and the possibilities of increased international cooperation in such efforts.

H.J. RES. —

Whereas, the United States should continue to sustain the momentum of physics and scientific research efforts which could lead to the necessary technological base for a commercial fusion energy cption; and

Whereas, budget projections for the next round of fusion test experiments and facilities are substantially larger than in the past, and budget restrictions in the United States and several other nations during the 1980s may impede individual domestic fusion efforts, thereby threatening fusion technology's progress; and

Whereas, the United States has successfully joined with other nations in the past to coordinate research and development techniques; and

Whereas, international communication, information exchanges and collaboration have been effective in refining and improving various fusion options, such as tandem mirrors and tokomaks, and in reducing the amount of duplication and total costs of such projects; and

Whereas, the state of fusion research in the United States, Japan, the European Community and the Soviet Union is such that the Committee on International Cooperation in Magnetic Fusion believe that a "window of time" now exists for the initiation of large scale collaboration;

Resolved by the House of Representatives and the Senate in Congress assembled, That the United States government should continue its historical commitment to the pursuit of fusion energy research and technology by establishing a clear set of policies, objectives and budgets for future U.S. fusion activities and should take the lead in consulting with prospective partners to initiate an international joint planning effort aimed at large scale collaboration.●

THE ADMINISTRATION'S FISCAL YEAR 1986 BUDGET

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed, but I must say not surprised, with the President's fiscal year 1986 budget that was unveiled earlier this week. As expected, President Reagan failed to moderate his stance on military spending and to consider slowing the rate of Pentagon spending. The administration's fiscal year 1986 budget repeats the pattern of the budgets of the first Reagan term of misplaced spending priorities that dump funds on the Pentagon while failing to provide adequate funding for important domestic programs.

In addition, the President continues to reiterate his support for a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution, as he did last night in his State of the Union Address; yet on Monday he submitted a budget that contains a deficit of $180 billion for fiscal year 1986. Although this is a reduction in the projected deficit, such a budget plan can hardly be considered a solution to the most pressing problem facing our Nation—reducing the Federal deficit. Realistic deficit reduction cannot occur until all programs—military and domestic—are put on the table.

Simply stated, the President's budget proposes to cut $32 billion from domestic programs and transfer an almost identical amount to military spending. A full $4 out of every $5 of the projected spending cuts would come from domestic programs. Over 30 percent of the administration's budget is allocated to military spending and foreign military assistance, 15 percent to interest on the national debt and 25 percent to Social Security and other retirement programs. The remaining 30 percent of the Reagan budget is allocated to all other domestic programs—from Medicare and unemployment benefits to agriculture and community development. While the military budget skyrockets at a proposed increase of 13 percent during fiscal year 1986, domestic programs are targeted for cutbacks and elimination.

For example, the administration has proposed reductions of 21 percent in major employment training programs. Even though the President proclaimed his support for the Job Training Partnership Act [JTPA] during his State of the Union Address, he proposed reductions of 55 percent in the title III of JTPA, which provides crucial assistance for dislocated workers. The administration is also seeking cuts in another program that benefits this groups of workers—Trade Adjustment Assistance.

Another area that the President has proposed to cut severely is aid to State and local governments. After communities and citizens of my district have tightened their belts to help get the State of Michigan back on its feet, the administration has proposed pulling the rug out from under them. I am also concerned that programs which help spur economic development in areas that need assistance, such as the Economic Development Administration, urban development action grants and community development block grants, are targetted either for elimination or deep cuts.

The President is also seeking drastic reductions in the pay and benefits of Federal employees. The President's budget assumes a 5-percent pay reduction, effective January 1986, for Federal civilian employees. Under existing law—the constitutionality of which is under litigation—the President may effect this reduction by Executive order. In that case, the reduction would also apply to Members. The Constitution prohibits reducing the salary of a sitting President or sitting judges. The budget assumes that future pay increases will be held to 3 percent each in January of 1987 and 1988.

The President proposes a 3-percent increase, effective July 1985, for the uniformed services—Federal civilian employees in the Defense Establishment would also suffer the 5-percent reduction.

The savings from the civilian pay reduction and subsequent caps—including benefits linked to pay such as life insurance—are estimated to be $1.3 billion, $2.5 billion, and $3.7 billion in fiscal years 1986–88 respectively.

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT COLA

The President proposes a 1-year COLA freeze for Federal civilian and military retirees. Under this proposal the January 1986 COLA—estimated to be approximately 4.3 percent—would be eliminated. No change is proposed in the COLA for Social Security, supplemental security income, and veterans' compensation.

After the 1-year freeze, civil service retirement adjustments would be limited to the lower of the change in the CPI or the Federal General Schedule—white-collar—pay increase, and adjustments for benefits in excess of $10,000 would be limited to 55 percent of the annual change. The $10,000 would be adjusted annually by the amount of the COLA adjustment. These changes are estimated to save $700 million, $1,250 million, and $1,660 million in fiscal years 1986–88 respectively.

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT BENEFITS REDUCTIONS

In addition to the COLA changes discussed above, the budget proposes the following reductions in civil service retirement benefits:

Reduction in annuity of 5 percent per year for each year an individual is under 65 at the time of retirement—to be phased in over 10 years.

Change the base on which benefits are computed from the highest 3 years of salary to the highest 5—employees eligible for retirement or within 3 years of retirement would not be affected.

Phase out retirement credit for unused sick leave.

Conform civil service survivor, adult student, and minimum benefits to those provided by Social Security.

Discontinue retirement, life insurance, and health insurance coverages for employees first hired by the District of Columbia.

These changes are estimated to save $31 million, $140 million, and $320 million in fiscal years 1986–88.

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT FINANCING CHANGES

The President proposes to increase employer contributions to the civil service retirement fund for certain off-budget agencies; namely, the Postal Service and the D.C. government. These agencies now contribute 7 percent of salary to the fund. The President proposes to increase these contributions by 2 percent each year until a 29-percent contribution level is reached—the level the President claims is necessary to cover the full cost of the retirement program for these agencies. Requiring the Postal Service to contribute an additional 2 percent is estimated to cost the Service $213 million in fiscal year 1986. The cost to the D.C. government is estimated to be less than $50 million in fiscal year 1986.

SUPPLEMENTAL RETIREMENT PLAN

The budget indicates "the administration plans to submit legislation for a new system containing a defined contribution plan and costing—including the employer share of Social Security—approximately 20 percent of payroll on an actuarial normal cost basis." This plan is intended for those Federal employees covered by Social Security.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES HEALTH BENEFITS PROGRAM [FEHBP]

The budget again proposes enactment of a so-called voucher system for the FEHBP. Under this plan, the Government's premium contribution—now roughly 60 percent of the full premium—would be increased each year by the percentage increase in the GNP deflator—one measure of inflation. Under existing law, the Government's contribution is fixed each year not to exceed 60 percent of the full average premium of the six most popular plans.

POSTAL SERVICE

In addition to the increased retirement contributions discussed above, the President proposes to eliminate the "revenue forgone" subsidy of preferred postal rates—for example, nonprofit rates. The Postal Service estimates that full funding for fiscal year 1986 rate subsidies would amount to $981 million. The budget indicates, however, that "legislation will be proposed to enable the Postal Service, itself, to continue the subsidy for most existing subsidized mailers." This "legislation" probably will include provisions eliminating some subsidized rates—for example, the in-county newspaper and magazine rate—and requiring the Postal Service—that is, the general ratepayers—to absorb the costs of subsidizing the remainder of the preferred rates—predominantly, the nonprofit rates.

BUDGET IMPACT ON ELEMENTARY, SECONDARY, VOCATIONAL EDUCATION AND OTHER HUMAN SERVICES PROGRAMS

Despite the uproar Nationwide in the past two years over the report called "A Nation at Risk" depicting our education system as one that lacks excellence and produces mediocrity, the President continues to ask for increasingly drastic cuts in education and other children's services in every budget he sends to the Congress.

The President, this year, proposes a "freeze" on elementary, secondary and vocational education programs, and drastic reductions and elimination of other, smaller programs within the education function of the budget. He would freeze the major elementary and secondary education programs at the FY 1985 levels, and does not even include an inflation factor for delivering these services in the out-years when the costs are expected to rise by 5 percent—the amount expected to be lost in real dollars when school districts begin to feel the effects of this budget "freeze" policy. Most education programs are forward funded, and the real impact will not be felt by states and local educational agencies until school year 1986-87, when FY 86 funds will begin to be spent.

The President recommends a 22 percent cut in Impact Aid programs, which he would achieve by eliminating payments for "B" children (those whose parents either live or work on Federal property), and by eliminating school construction funds except in cases of schools destroyed by major disasters.

Besides proposing a freeze on Chapters I and II of ECIA, the President again proposes to give parents the option of using State Chapter I funds in the form of vouchers issued to them, allowing parents to "shop around" for a school for their children, public or private, using the vouchers to pay for the chosen education mode. The Congress is not likely to pass the legislation necessary for the President's voucher-option program in lieu of the proven successful delivery of educational equity under Chapter I to poor students who need remedial and other compensatory education services in elementary schools. I would certainly oppose all efforts to turn Chapter I into a voucher system, as vigorously as I will continue to oppose tuition tax credits.

Although the President declares that he is not reducing education funding by freezing major programs at the FY 85 level, a close look at smaller programs which he reduces or seeks to eliminate, reveals that he has managed to propose a .3 billion dollar reduction in elementary, secondary, vocational and related programs. Some of the program cuts and reductions he proposes are:

To eliminate $30 million to fund emergency immigration education programs. The President has already sent a request to Congress to rescind $30 million for this program appropriated for use in FY 85.

Other Bilingual Education programs are "frozen" at the FY 85 level, but the President would also permit state and local educational agencies to use bilingual funds for "English as a Second Language" (ESL) program, rather than the transitional bilingual programs that permit students to be taught in their native languages while learning English. This proposal is contrary to the just-reauthorized Bilingual Education Act which continues the transitional approach to teaching limited-English proficient students in our schools.

Reduce by $42 million state grants for migrant education programs. The President proposes that children who have been in migrant education programs for up to three years can no longer be termed "migratory" and therefore should be dropped from migrant education activities. He recommends that such students then be picked up by the States using other sources, such as Chapter I funds, for their continued compensatory education needs. Again, this change in migrant education programs would require the Congress to pass legislation to that effect, and I am not convinced that we will do so.

The President has also proposed to eliminate $75 million for Excellence in Education under Chapter II; $6 million would be eliminated for WEEA (Womens' Educational Equity), a one-third reduction in funds in FY 86 for desegregation activities, with a total phase out by FY 1988; the elimination of $33 million for consumer/homemaking under Vocational Education, folding that amount into the State Basic Grant for Voc Ed; and a recommendation that a portion of the $32 million Secretary's discretionary fund under Chapter II be used to pay for the Congressionally-mandated assessment of Chapter I program effectiveness.

Child Nutrition and National School Lunch Programs would be placed at risk by the President's request to eliminate the Federal subsidy for lunches served to "paying" students. Yet these subsidies are used by the schools for labor and equipment needs that permit them to offer the more important free and reduced-price lunches to severely needy children. Loss of the subsidy for paid lunches would not result merely in a loss of students participating, but entire schools may be forced out of participating in the School Lunch and Breakfast Programs, placing our children at risk due to malnutrition.

In the area of social and human services for children, the elderly and other special groups, the President would eliminate the Work Incentive Program (WIN), the Job Corps Program, and would slightly reduce and then freeze older Americans programs such as Title V, the Community Services Employment for Older Persons, the Domestic Volunteers Services Programs which include RSVP, Foster Grand Parents, and Senior Companions, and a 10 percent reduction in Community Development Block Grants.

BUDGET IMPACT ON FEDERAL STUDENT FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

February 3 on "Face the Nation," House Budget Chairman, William Gray, was asked what in the Reagan budget was most offensive. His answer was the reductions requested for Federal higher education assistance, especially, student aid. The President's budget proposes a 33% or $2.51 billion reduction in the area of Postsecondary Education. The following is a brief description of the proposed cuts in student financial assistance.

STUDENT FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

In the Pell grant program, the President is proposing a $445 million reduction. Additionally, students from families with adjusted gross incomes above $25,000 would be ineligible for all Federal grants and loans, except Guaranteed Student Loans, regardless of family situation. Currently, 5% of all Pell Grant recipients come from families with income above $25,000. All students would be required to provide at least $800 toward their education and any student under the age of 22 who is not a ward of the court, or orphan, or able to prove economic self-sufficiency would be automatically considered to be dependent. The impact of these proposals, if enacted, would be to eliminate over 625,000 students from participation in the program.

The Administration is also proposing language amending the FY 1985 (education) appropriations bill to reduce the maximum grant from $2100 to $2000 and limiting the amount of the grant to no more than 50 percent of the cost of attendance because of a projected $450 million shortfall in the Pell Grant program this year for which it does not intend to request a supplemental appropriation. The impact of the language is particularly adverse to the lowest income students. Under current law if there is a shortfall in funding those students receiving maximum awards (those who show the most need) do not have their grants affected. Only those receiving smaller awards have them reduced. The Congress created this linear reduction formula in order to protect the most needy students. The proposed language would reduce by $100 the awards of approximately 150,000 students and reduce by 17% the awards of another 650,000 students. Again, these are the students who show the most need. Students with less than maximum need would not be affected by the proposal.

The Guaranteed Student Loan program proposals contain the following elements:

A reduction in Federal expenditures of $426 million;

Students from families with adjusted gross incomes over $32,500 would be eligible for awards;

Borrowers would pay interest rates of 91-day Treasury bills instead of the current fixed 8% rate;

A special allowance of 1.5% for students in school and 3.0% when students begin repayment;

No further advances or administrative allowances would be provided for guarantee agencies;

Default reinsurance to guarantee agencies would be reduced to a maximum of 90% and a minimum of 50% (Current law allows 100% reinsurance);

Loans would have to be disbursed on a multiple disbursement basis;

These proposals would eliminate approximately 30% (800,000 to 900,000) currently eligible students because of the maximum income cap; greatly increase loan indebtedness of students because of the increased interest rate responsibility; and, in all probability, force most if not all banks and guarantee agencies out of the program. In essence, these proposals would mark the demise of the Guaranteed Student Loan program.

The Administration further proposes to eliminate the State Student Incentive Grant (SSIG) program and any further Federal contribution for the National Direct Student Loan (NDSL) program. As a result 448,000 fewer awards will be available. There is a further proposal to eliminate the Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants (SEOGs) but to increase College Work Study (CWS) funds to $850 million with 50% available at the institutional level for grants. A net result would be 378,000 fewer awards and $250 million less for the programs.

Finally, the Administration proposes to limit total Federal student aid to $4,000 per student. As a result approximately 450,000 students would have their awards decreased and the concept of "choice of institutions" would be effectively destroyed.

BUDGET IMPACT ON MICHIGAN STUDENTS

The reductions in Federal student financial assistance would have a substantial impact on students attending Michigan postsecondary education institutions.

For FY 1985, it is estimated that Michigan students will receive $140.4 million in Pell grant awards. Under the proposed budget that amount is reduced to $120.74 million. Similarly, for the current academic year students attending Michigan schools will receive $14.949 million in SEOG awards; $19.057 million in CWS jobs; $6.416 million in NDSL loans; and $3.139 million in SSIG funds. Under the Reagan budget proposals those students would receive only $27.292 million under the programs, for a reduction of 50%. Additionally, the President's budget proposals would result in the elimination of the GSL program which provided over $200 million in funds for Michigan students in the past year.

The following chart summarizes the budget proposal.

Program	Fiscal year— 1985 funding (estimated)	1986 budget proposal	Amount of change
Pell	$140,400,000	$120,740,000	−$19,620,000
SEOG	14,948,728	0	−14,948,728
CWS	19,056,604	0	−19,056,604
NDSL	6,416,473	0	−6,416,473
SSIG	3,139,463	0	−3,139,463
College work/study grants		27,292,808	+27,292,808
Total	181,135,768	148,032,808	−33,112,968

BUDGET IMPACT ON THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENTS FOR THE ARTS AND HUMANITIES

The President has recommended that funding for the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Endowment for the Humanities be reduced by approximately 11 percent each and that funding for the Institute for Museum Services be virtually eliminated.

The endowments were established in 1965, and between 1965 and 1980 our Nation began to experience a virtual explosion of the arts and humanities. Within the short span of 15 years, professional symphony orchestras increased six-fold; professional theater groups grew tenfold; and the number of dance companies expanded from 30 to 400. For the first time, we as a nation came closer to insuring that access to our Nation's vast cultural resources would not be determined by economic or geographic circumstances.

Since he first assumed office in 1981, the President has recommended drastic reductions for funding these Federal programs in each of his annual budgets. Although each year the Congress has been unwilling to go along with cuts to the extent proposed over this four year period, the Endowments have lost ground, threatening the existence of the cultural institutions they support which mirror our lives and preserve our heritage.

We cannot afford to reduce Federal support for these programs. We have been enriched through the creative energies of our most talented individuals, and through their works we are provided a clearer vision of ourselves and of our Nation. No less important, the arts and humanities stimulate and strengthen economic growth in our communities. I oppose a budget which overlooks the importance of such a significant contribution to our society.●

SAVE THE FOLGER THEATRE

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a concurrent resolution that will bring to my colleagues attention the desperate financial plight of the Folger Theatre and our need to save this important cultural facility. In addition, I am introducing a bill that will authorize the Director of the Smithsonian Institution to make a grant of $500,000 to the director of the Folger Theatre, to insure its continued operation until a long-term financial solution to the problem can be worked out.

On January 14, 1985, the director of the Folger Library, Werner Gundersheimer, announced that the board of trustees of Amherst College had made a decision to cease operations at the Folger Theatre as of June 30, 1985.

For the past 15 years this theatre has brought to life a treasury of Renaissance and Elizabethan manuscripts that are housed at the Folger Library.

The Folger Theatre is a "Lort-D Equity House." It has, for the past 3 years, employed a resident company of 75 employees, including actors, artists, directors, costume and set designers and builders—skilled and technical people living in the District of Columbia who are dedicated to the idea of living theater in the form of Shakespeare and the classics.

Under the direction of O.B. Hardison, Jr., a dormant replica of the Old Globe Theatre was activated as part of theater. The theater has 253 seats and presents works of Shakespeare, and the classics year round. The theater faces dwindling subsidies and because of its size and noncommercial repertoire, it fails to generate enough funds to be self-sufficient.

The closing of the Folger Theatre would also affect the operations of the Folger Conservatory, where members of the Folger Theatre Co. teach weekly acting clases for adults and young people.

Mr. Speaker, although the Folger Theatre functions primarily as a facility for staging the classics, it has also staged the American premiers of such important contemporary American dramas as "The Farm" and "Whose Life Is It Anyway."

We must keep the Folger Theatre open because it is an important cultural and educational institution and it provides a valuable service—to inspire and uplift the human spirit for people of all economic strata.

We must help this noncommercial theater survive because it serves all people. It seems to be the present administration's policy that the arts are only for a limited few who can comprehend and enjoy them; and that the marketplace is the best adjudicator of values in our society. What in essence meets the popular fancy will prevail, what falls short of such a criterion deserves obscurity and certainly no support.

Mr. Speaker, as politicians we are perceived by many in the arts community as caring very little about the arts and this view has been exemplified by the cuts proposed by the Reagan administration with regard to the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Endowment or the Humanities. If history has shown us anything, it is that a civilization flourishes when the arts flourish in that civilization. Esthetic values and culture are not luxuries they are necessities. We as politicians share a moral obligation to create conditions under which institutions such as the Folger Theatre can flourish under a maximum of dignity and freedom.●

THE REALISTIC MIDDLE GROUND ON THE STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

HON. BEVERLY B. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, there has been much debate about the Strategic Defense Initiative [SDI] and its arms control aspects and, although the debate has generally been quite polarized, there recently has been some very constructive discussion on this topic. The January 17 issue of The Wall Street Journal contained a spectrum of reactions to comprehensive editorial-page coverage on arms control and the SDI which had appeared in the January 2 issue of the Journal. One of the most valuable contributions among these reactions was a letter written by my colleague, the Honorable MARILYN LLOYD. Mrs. LLOYD views arms control matters and the SDI Program from the broad technology perspective of membership on both the Science and Technology and Armed Services Committees of the House. She chairs the Energy Research and Production Subcommittee of the Science and Technology Committee, which authorizes funding for the Department of Energy's Space Nuclear Power Program, while the full Committee on Science and Technology authorizes funding for all of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's [NASA's] space power activities. Thus, Mrs. LLOYD has a keen interest in SDI because of the strong program linkage driven by the space power requirements of the various defensive technologies.

I strongly recommend Mrs. LLOYD's letter to my colleagues. It includes discussions of attractive arms control aspects of SDI, a critique of certain scientific criticisms of the program and a rationale for emphasizing the deterrent features of a partially deployed missile defense system.

MIDDLE GROUND

You are to be commended for your editorial-page coverage Jan. 2 regarding arms-control talks and certain aspects of the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI). The historical evidence is that the implementation of SALT in the framework of Mutual Assured Destruction (MAD) resulted in a massive Soviet buildup in strategic weaponry. Also, holding to SALT-II agreements (although unsigned) requires a U.S. missile exchange which actually lessens the deterrent quality of our strategic forces.

The letter reply to your thoughtful editorial "'Star Wars' Seen as Unworkable and Dangerous," although touted by the authors as a correction to Journal errors, appears to me both inadequate and off-target. Also, as charming a gentleman as he is, I am nevertheless uncomfortable when Dr. Bethe joins with Richard Garwin, the perennial gadfly of the arms control arena, in presuming to know what is the Soviet perception of the Administration's SDI program. Unfortunately, these two scientists have a rather poor track record when they purport "to wear the Red Hat."

It is a sad commentary on the quality of the SDI debate that the outrageous assumption that limited defense cannot contribute to deterrence can be glibly stated as if it were a timeless truth. I, for one, choose the middle ground with Dr. Brzezinski and Prof. Carter, who notes, "[Recognizing T]he dim prospect for leakproof nuclear defense . . . does not end, but just begins, a serious discussion of other missions for missile defense."

On the other hand, Dr. Jastrow cannot be accused of anything more than an excusable bias for positive SDI prospects as a balance to the Union of Concerned Scientists' spokesmen. And he should be credited with helping "smoke them out" on certain technical aspects of SDI.

MARILYN LLOYD,

A BILL TO EXTEND EDUCATIONAL BENEFITS TO VIETNAM VETERANS

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr.FRANK . Mr. Speaker, last year, the Congress enacted a new GI bill program of educational benefits for men and women who serve in our armed services. By passing this legislation we demonstrated, not only our gratitude for those who choose to serve in our military, but also our recognition of the value that educational opportunity brings to individuals and to the society at large.

Unfortunately, as we look back at the previous GI bill for Vietnam veterans, we find that many are losing this educational opportunity when they need it most. While the program is not scheduled to expire until 1989, the 10-year limit within which benefits must be used by each veteran is creating serious problems among those who, for whatever reason, did not use their assistance promptly upon their discharge. Therefore, I am introducing legislation that will remove the delimiting date on the Vietnam-era GI bill. This measure will allow Vietnam veterans to use any portions of their entitlement that was lost due to the 10-year cutoff. It would not add benefits, only the time period within which a veteran's benefits could be used. The 1989 deadline would remain. Thus, the effect of the legislation would be to provide a "window of opportunity" for Vietnam veterans whose entitlement ended before they used all of their assistance money.

Mr. Speaker, we have only recently begun to give the Vietnam veterans their due. I see this measure as an investment. By giving Vietnam veterans this one last shot at using their GI bill benefits, we will be encouraging advancement to people who are, not only very deserving, but motivated, as well. It is, I believe, an appropriate way to help veterans who may have missed an opportunity, but who can use this second chance to rise to their full potential.●

A MORATORIUM ON COMMERCIAL WHALING

HON. DON BONKER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, another showdown is brewing for this year's International Whaling Commission [IWC] meeting in July. At issue is Japan's continued commercial slaughter of thousands of whales. This time, however, the United States could find itself allied with the whale killers rather than with the whale conservation countries. In November 1984, the United States negotiated an agreement with Japan that would allow that country to continue commercial whaling until 1988 despite the IWC's overwhelming decision, which the United States supported, to suspend all commercial whaling in 1986.

The agreement with Japan circumvents U.S. law, which requires certification of countries whose actions diminish the effectiveness of IWC decisions, gives official sanction to whaling in violation of established IWC regulations, and makes a mockery of consistent administration commitments to the Congress that countries which violate IWC decisions would be certified.

In order to demonstrate continuing congressional concern for the conservation of the world's endangered whale species, I am introducing today a resolution on this matter with my distinguished colleagues Representatives YATRON and GEJDENSON. This measure calls on the President to ensure full U.S. support for the whale conservation initiatives of the IWC, urges all nations to abide by the IWC's decisions, and calls for certification of countries whose whaling actions diminish the effectiveness of IWC regulations.

Since 1972, the United States has been in the forefront of international efforts to strengthen protection for the world's endangered whales. In view of the importance of this year's IWC meeting, it is timely for the Congress to reaffirm our support for the moratorium on commercial whaling as well as our opposition to any weakening of long-standing U.S. leadership in this endeavor.

I would encourage my distinguished colleagues to join us in co-sponsoring this resolution.●

VACCINATION AND DANGEROUS SIDE EFFECTS

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, immunizations have virtually eradicated many diseases in this country and have saved millions of children from disability and death. However, as we know, sometimes immunizations can have potentially dangerous reactions. We are here today to discuss the pertussis portion of the DPT vaccination which has been associated with potentially dangerous side effects, including seizure disorders, brain damage and in rare cases, death.

I first became aware of the problems associated with the DPT vaccine through Jeff Schwartz of Dissatisfied Parents Together. Jeff knew of my interest in seizure disorders because I have epilepsy. I had the pleasure of addressing this newly formed group at their first public meeting in May of 1982. From that first meeting, there have been hundreds of parents in groups around the country who have joined in the effort to collect information about the DPT vaccine.

Because of the hard work of concerned parents, doctors, and members of the media, we now know more about the adverse reactions of the DPT vaccine to our children, but so much more needs to be done. Our first priority must be to develop a safer, more effective vaccine. Furthermore, a compensation program is necessary. Last year, I cosponsored H.R. 5810, the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Compensation Act, which created a national vaccine injury program that would compensate children who are injured by adverse reactions to vaccines. When this bill is reintroduced later this month I will cosponsor it again and work hard for passage of this legislation in Congress.

I am not advocating the elimination of the DPT vaccine. We all agree that our children need to be immunized against pertussis—whooping cough. However, we as parents need to be made aware of the possible risks involved in the event that our children experience an adverse reaction to the vaccine. Our physicians need to report all cases where a child experiences a serious reaction to the National Centers for Disease Control. Furthermore, those of us in Congress must continue to investigate the problems surrounding the DPT vaccine so that we can develop an adequate compensation program, and ultimately a safer, more effective vaccine.●

IDAHO WILDERNESS ACT

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I am joined by my colleague, Representative KOSTMAYER, in reintroducing the Idaho Wilderness Act which would protect some of this Nation's most outstanding wilderness areas remaining in Idaho.

Last year, both of our offices were contacted by many of our constituents who believe that it is of the highest national importance to protect the remaining wild lands in the northern Rockies. Because of this interest and our own concerns, we had the privilege of accompanying Public Lands Subcommittee Chairman JOHN SEIBERLING and our colleague Representative LARRY CRAIG on portions of the subcommittee's inspection trip to Idaho.

These public lands are truly magnificent. The people of Idaho and all Americans are indeed fortunate that we still have an opportunity to ensure that these areas will be available for the enjoyment of our children in the future as they are presently enjoyed today.

Most importantly, we must keep in mind that these are America's public lands. Just as the money to manage the national forests and develop our national natural resources comes from all our citizens, so too, should all Americans share in decisions over preservation of the best of America's wilderness. This can be accomplished without damaging the important economic interests that depend on forest lands and with the highest consideration for those individuals who live closest to the land.

The Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs will have to determine the best balance between wilderness and development for Idaho's remaining 9 million acres of wild land. There is substantial disagreement as to where that balance lies. Proposals have ranged from 0.5 million acres to 4.5 million acres of wilderness. While we appreciate and respect the reasoning which have led to each of the proposals, we believe that our proposal for 3.5 million acres of wilderness is a fair, balanced, and defensible position. We will work to see that the committee considers this proposal as a vehicle to foster movement in the Idaho wilderness debate.

We wish to continue to study these areas and discuss important issues or conflicts and we look forward to working with the committee to resolve this problem fairly.

In summary, the Idaho wilderness debate is not a numbers game. It is a decision on specific wilderness tracts and should be deliberately and fully debated. Certainly a compromise is attainable—evidence the passage of the Wisconsin wilderness bill that received the unanimous support of its bipartisan delegation. We hope that our Idaho proposal, which we believe is in the interests of a great many Americans, will prove useful to the committee and the House in the days ahead.●

IN HONOR OF THE LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION

HON. RON MARLENEE

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, last year during the waining days of the 98th Congress I introduced H.R. 6064 to authorize the establishment of a Lewis and Clark National Historic Site at the Great Falls of the Missouri River in Montana. With Congress' early adjournment for the election, the House Interior Committee was unable to review or hold hearings on the merits of this legislation.

Today I reintroduce that House bill as H.R. 1064. As I stated last July, it gives me great pleasure and honor to introduce this legislation which will authorize a land donation by the State of Montana to the Secretary of the Interior for the purpose of constructing a visitor center to commemorate the historic portage of the Lewis and Clark expedition around the magnificent Great Falls of the Missouri. This site also offers much more than just the portage efforts of Lewis and Clark but is also approximately the midway point of the entire expedition. In addition, the Lewis and Clark expedition traversed and explored the entire area near the Great Falls on their way to and from the west coast. I think all of these facts and more can be highlighted during the hearing process.

However, there is one issue that has to be addressed and that is section 4 of the bill, authorizing appropriations. I am a realist and know the tight budget situation Congress, the President, and the American people face. I think when this bill reaches the hearing process we may have to look at other funding sources besides Uncle Sam. I know the community leaders in Great Falls and surrounding area understand this and if we all work together the goal of a National Historical Site can still be accomplished. A good relationship has been formed between the private sector, the city of Great Falls, the county of Cascade, the State of Montana, and the Federal Government on this project.

Mr. Speaker, I request this bill be again referred to the House Interior Committee as soon as possible so we can hold hearings in the near future.●

THE FAIRNESS IN GIFT TAX ACT

HON. ALAN B. MOLLOHAN

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. MOLLOHAN. Mr. Speaker, for more than 50 years, it was assumed by taxpayers that interest-free or below market rate loans did not give rise to any taxable gift on the amount of uncollected interest. Such loans are typically made by parents to their children to help them finance their education, start a business, get married, or buy their first home. Not until February 22, 1984, when the Supreme Court decided the Dickman case, was there any conclusive authority for the imposition of a gift tax on these kinds of loans to the extent of uncharged market rate interest.

The Supreme Court in Dickman held that the gift tax should apply, and, given the statutory basis for that decision, the effect is that the gift tax applies retroactively to 1932. The retroactivity is unfair. In hearings held before the Senate last year, when the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 was being considered, the retroactivity problem was discussed in detail by many concerned taxpayers.

The chief complaint was, and is, that taxpayers who comply with the law as it is then understood should not thereafter be surprised with a heavy tax burden for old transactions. Taxpayers also resented the Government's sudden intrusion into intrafamily affairs. There are also overwhelming administrative problems. The amount of prior taxable gifts must be known with certainty to report later gifts and to calculate estate tax. The Supreme Court's retroactive decision impugns the integrity of decades of such returns and makes accurate future reporting nearly impossible, given the valuation problems with such old transactions. The situation is further exacerbated where the deemed gift arises from the loan of property other than money.

To blunt some of this criticism and recognizing that the retroactive application of the gift tax to past years was unfair, created administrative difficulties, and was bad tax policy, the IRS announced that it would not apply the gift tax to loans in any given year which did not exceed $100,000 in principal. The IRS also published new interest rates to figure the amount of interest considered to be a gift, in contrast to the inflated interest rates, as high as twice the prime rate, which were then being asserted in pending cases. The IRS, however, provided no relief to other taxpayers, even though the unfairness in the retroactive assertion of the gift tax, as well as all the other problems, applied equally to those individuals. The IRS reserved the right to go back to 1932.

Prior to the Dickman decision, Congress was studying the tax consequences of interest-free and below-market rate loans and decided that changes in the law were necessary. The proposed legislation, which ultimately became section 172 of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, was to apply only to loans made, or in existence, after the effective date of that law. Indeed, Congress recognized the significant change in the law which was being made and provided relief for loans existing on the effective date by relieving such loans of the gift—and other—taxes imposed by that law if such loans were repaid within 60 days. Section 172 of DEFRA became effective on June 6, 1984.

The provisions of section 172, which have only prospective application, afford no relief for transactions entered into prior to its effective date, so that such transactions are still subject to gift tax under the Dickman decision, from 1932 to 1984.

The Fairness in Gift Tax Act will rectify this anomaly. This new act will complete the relief which even the IRS has conceded is due, settle ambiguities, and place the taxation of these loan transactions on a prospective basis, as Congress did when it provided detailed rules in section 172 of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984.●

ENACTMENT OF LINE-ITEM VETO IS ESSENTIAL

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, from the beginning to the end of each year's budget battle, the same cry is heard: Someday, sometime, the budget must be balanced.

Again, Mr. Speaker, this House confronts yet another fiscal year's budget without having in place a most necessary tool: The Presidential power of the line-item veto. I have introduced legislation today which will amend the Constitution to include the line-item veto. This legislation is the same as House Joint Resolution 399 from the 98th Congress which I introduced during the first session.

State governments know that one of the most vital tools in their efforts to keep their budgets balanced is the line-item veto. Today, 43 Governors have that power, and the system of checks and balances provides the State legislatures with the ability to override any gubernatorial veto.

The question that must be raised is, why has the Congress not seen the virtue of the line-item veto and granted that power to the President of the United States?

Enactment of the line-item veto would permit the President to delete unnecessary items from appropriations bills, without vetoing an otherwise worthy bill in its entirety. This veto authority would enable the President to dramatically reduce the "pork barrel" spending syndrome that has plagued this and other Congresses. The President now has only one choice when Congress passes a bill and sends it to his desk: Sign it in its entirety or reject it. There is no chance for compromise, no chance for him to keep the good and veto the bad, saving taxpayers billions of dollars.

Public support for the line-item veto is evident. A recent Gallup poll indicated that 64 percent of Americans favor giving the President this deficit-fighting power. Every President since Ulysses S. Grant, including Franklin D. Roosevelt, has sought this authority. Surely all those Presidents can't be wrong. And, since 1936, at least 80 constitutional amendments providing for an item veto have been introduced. Surely all those legislators can't be wrong.

Last year, in his State of the Union Address, the President asked Congress to pass an amendment to the Constitution granting this—and every—President the line-item veto. Last night, in his fifth State of the Union Address, President Ronald Reagan made that same request of the Congress.

Possibly, this year, the Congress will heed the call of the President and the American people and enact such legislation.●

MARCH 20TH PROCLAIMED NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

HON. EDWARD R. MADIGAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, today Mr. DE LA GARZA of Texas, chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, and I have introduced a resolution requesting the President of the United States to proclaim March 20, 1985, as National Agriculture Day. We are joined in cosponsorship by many other Members of the House and we hope that many more of our colleagues will join in support of this commemorative endeavor.

At a time when fewer than 4 percent of our Nation's population are farmers and ranchers, it is appropriate to call attention to that vital segment of America which produces the food, fiber, and forest products on which we all depend.

Farming today is more than a way of life. It is a basic business in the Nation's economy.

Let me put that in a more meaningful way: Agriculture is basic to our economy. All other endeavors, including life itself, depend upon agriculture's food-producing capability.

Today, one farmworker produces enough food and fiber for 76 people. Families across the face of the Earth—including those in famine-plagued Africa—share in the abundance of America's farms and ranches. The progress achieved in agriculture through the years has made it possible and profitable for more and more people to leave the farm and take up other pursuits to help provide the goods and services for a growing population.

A strong America depends upon a strong agriculture. We must never allow those without agriculture interests to lose sight of that fact. That is the purpose of the National Agriculture Day resolution that we have introduced today.●

PAUL LEE GRAY

HON. GUY V. MOLINARI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep personal sadness that I note here today the death of a most valued member of my Washington staff, Paul Gray. Paul passed away last Thursday evening at the young age of 30. Funeral services were held last Saturday in his hometown of Durham, NC. He was buried in neighboring Bahama, NC.

Paul worked in my office for over 2½ years and I came to rely on him heavily as my correspondence manager. His diligence and dedication to his work were exemplary. He truly was a public servant and took his responsibilities most seriously. In constant service to my constituents, he, through his work, was a real example of representative government and democracy at its best. The people of the 14th Congressional District of New York were served most well by Paul.

I know that I personally will dearly miss his presence in the office, as will all the members of my staff. He was more than just a coworker to us all—he was someone that you quickly grew to like. I saw this happen over and over again with many different people. Most of the time, he was either wearing a smile or causing one.

He has left us many good memories, ones that we will value always. In this respect we are so grateful to have known Paul and to have worked with him.

To his parents, his brother Danny and his sister Tammy, I extend my heartfelt sympathy at Paul's passing. I hope you will be proud of the work Paul did in the U.S. House of Representatives. I most certainly am, and to him I am ever grateful.●

A BILL TO ESTABLISH AND FUND AN EARTHQUAKE ENGINEERING RESEARCH CENTER

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to establish a research and experimental test facility that will provide engineering professionals with the tools needed to allow them to build more effective earthquake-resistant structures.

The United States will, without question, experience a devastating earthquake; the only question is when and where. As a Representative from California, I have a strong regional awareness of the hidden dangers and potential damages that can result from even moderate tremblers. Nevertheless, few people realize that as many as 70 million people in 39 States face this threat; the possible loss of life from a major event has been estimated at 23,000, with economic damage reaching nearly $50 billion. And surprisingly, the potential for damage in the Eastern United States is far more severe than in the Western half of the Nation. More densely populated cities, built on easily crumbled river banks, with old energy and transportation lifelines would, in the course of a quake, leave the eastern seaboard and Northeastern States in far worse economic condition, and with a greater loss of life, than a similar event in the Western United States, a region better prepared.

This has all been expertly explained in the National Research Council's Ad Hoc Committee on Earthquake Engineering Facilities and Instrumentation. This is a nonpartisan board, made up of engineering experts, both in the public and private sector, under the aegis of the National Academy of Sciences. These same concerns were voiced in hearings in the House Committee on Science and Technology, in September of last year. Representative GEORGE BROWN has been a particular leader in trying to do more to understand, predict, and mitigate the damage of earthquakes.

Yet current funds devoted to improvements in seismic engineering amount to less than $10 million, or only .02 percent of the potential cost of a major earthquake.

The bill I am proposing would closely follow the recommendations of the National Research Council's report. The report calls for a "coordinated, mission-oriented national program * * * to provide information and understanding that will make the most rapid and cost-effective contribution to seismic resistant structures."

The bill establishes a National Earthquake Emergency Research Center at an existing university. It identifies and devotes resources to the three needs associated with earthquake engineering: An upgrading of the current research-based earthquake test program; the development and growth of a large national earthquake engineering test facility with the ability to test full or nearly full-scale multi-story structures, in an earthquake-simulated environment; enhanced support for computer modeling facilities, in conjuction with other university facilities on seismic engineering.

Right now, the experimental earthquake facilities in our universities are old and with limited capabilities. There is a pressing need to modernize them, with state-of-the-art technologies, so that university faculty may be able to educate young, up-and-coming engineers in the field. This should be, in the NRC's words, the Government's highest priority.

Finally, there is agreement in the scientific community, echoed in the NRC report, on the need for a research facility to provide the basic data on how different buildings will stand up to and can be hardened against earthquakes. The NRC found that the major lack of information was on the behavior of "earthquake excited structures from initiation of structural damage to collapse." Getting this type of data would be "the fastest way to change our ability to design and construct more seismic resistant structures." In order to obtain this type of information, our Nation needs to have a more advanced research base, a part of an attempt to build safer, longer lasting buildings and homes and to save lives.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, this bill will cost money—money which we don't have in these years of unprecedented deficits. Yet the need to do more to protect Americans from the certainty of coming earthquakes demands that we find a way to fund this program. I am a supporter of the pay-as-you-go budget proposals, and believe that this bill should be accomplished by a financing mechanism. Therefore, I have included a second part of the bill which establishes a temporary excise tax on items common to all large buildings: escalators and elevators. This tax would be set at a level necessary to fund the establishment of the National Center and the construction of its major research devices, such as a large "shaking table." Once these capital costs were met, the excise tax would expire. While I have set the tax rate at 5 percent for 5 years, the exact cost of the Center and the amount of revenue required for it can best be determined through the congressional hearing process.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill in an effort to protect our existing and future communities, and most importantly, to prevent the loss of human lives from the inevitable earthquakes of the future.

REMEMBERING THE CIVILIAN CONSEP"ATION CORPS

HON. FREDERICK C. BOUCHER

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BOUCHER. Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of the 99th Congress, it is appropriate for us to pay tribute to a Federal program which left a positive legacy for future generations.

Enacted by the Congress in March 1933, the Civilian Conservation Corps was an invaluable tool of the Roosevelt administration to combat unemployment among young men. During the lifetime of the program, almost 3 million men performed a variety of outdoor tasks at the CCC's 2,500 camps located throughout the Nation. Although they were paid only $30 per month for their service, these men worked hard planting trees, stocking lakes and streams with fish, building bridges, roads and dams, and assisting Depression-stricken farmers with erosion-control efforts.

In my district of southwestern Virginia, unemployed youth participated in the CCC as members of camp 2380, located in Jonesville, VA. During its best days, 180 men lived and worked in camp 2380, and their fine work can be seen today in the beautiful forests of Lee County and in the trails and roads which still exist in many of the county's more remote areas. Although it is impossible to calculate the value to the CCC's work to the people of Lee County through the provision of road repairs, soil conservation and fire prevention, I can assure the members of camp 2380 that their contributions live on and are remembered with appreciation.

Each year, the members of camp 2380 hold a reunion during the last weekend of May. The reunion, which is organized annually by Mr. John Ashby, Sr., of Grundy, VA, is indicative of how fondly the CCC days are remembered by its participants. When the men of camp 2380 hold their Jonesville reunion later this spring, they can remember with pride the contributions which they made to their Nation.●

A TRIBUTE TO MR. BENJAMIN AARON

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to a great teacher, a great man and a great friend, Mr. Benjamin Aaron. I was a student at the Law School of the University of California at Los Angeles when I met Mr. Aaron, a professor there. His inspiring course in labor law sparked my interest in the field of law that I would make my career—hundreds of others who have studied under Professor Aaron can say the same. From the beginning of his career as a member of the National War Labor Board in 1942 through his service as chairman of the California Farm Labor Panel and also as a member of the National Committee on Technology, Automation and Economic Progress in 1965–66, his work as president of the Industrial Relations Research Association in 1972, and his learned advice as special consultant to the Joint Committee on Public Employer-Employee Relations, Benjamin Aaron has built a record of commitment and excellence that is an inspiration to all. I am privileged to join his friends and colleagues in expressing my admiration and gratitude, for myself and for the entire community, and to wish Mr. Aaron all the very best.●

THE TIME HAS COME FOR A WINTERING WATERFOWL RESEARCH FACILITY

HON. JOHN B. BREAUX

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to establish a laboratory to study the effects of the loss of wintering habitat on migratory waterfowl.

Migratory waterfowl have been the responsibility of the Federal Government for more than 65 years since the signing of the Migratory Bird Treaty with Great Britain for Canada in 1916 and the passage of the Migratory Bird Treaty Act in 1918. Migratory birds are truly an international resource, heeding no boundary in their annual flights from breeding grounds to wintering areas and back again.

Since 1918, we have developed an international management program to conserve this resource. We have established hunting seasons, purchased refuges, regulated wetland areas, and conducted research in our efforts to develop an effective management system. We have learned that the biggest threat to these birds is the loss of habitat. At first, the management program was concerned primarily with breeding habitat. For waterfowl, this meant the prairie potholes and other wetlands of Canada, Alaska, and the States of the upper Midwest. For years, both research and habitat protection activities concentrated on breeding habitat. We developed a research facility in North Dakota to study the effects of loss of breeding habitat on migratory waterfowl. We established wetland management areas and purchased easements on prairie potholes.

While the concentration of resources on breeding habitat made sense in the past, at the present time the threats to migratory waterfowl from the loss of wintering habitat are probably more severe because of the staggering loss of wetlands in the southern coastal areas and bottomland hardwoods along the rivers of the South. Each year, we are losing more than 40 square miles of coastal marshes and hundreds of thousands of acres of already scarce bottomland hardwoods.

Preliminary studies indicate this wetland loss could be having severe impacts on waterfowl. For example, recent studies in Louisiana indicate that pair bonding, which is essential to nesting success, may be adversely affected by changes in diet as birds are crowded out of the marsh and onto rice fields or other agricultural lands.

We need to know the effects this loss of wintering habitat is causing. We cannot run a concentrated research program on this problem from the upper Midwest. That is why I am introducing legislation to establish a wintering habitat research facility. I recognize that the establishment of such a facility will be expensive. We will be looking carefully at the proposed budget of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service in the next several weeks. We will attempt to incorporate the funding for this facility within current spending limits.

We should remember, however, that we are spending millions on waterfowl management each year, much of it coming from fees and taxes paid by waterfowl hunters. To ignore research into a critical area of habitat loss would be truly penny wise and pound foolish.●

ABANDONING HOUSING WHILE HOMELESSNESS GROWS

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to address the House on perhaps one of the most alarming issues of our times. The number of homeless people in America has grown significantly in the last several years under the Reagan administration from a controllable social issue to one of unknown costs and consequences. Ironically as the U.S. economy has flourished so too has the number of homeless, the poor, and the unemployed. In New York City alone the number of homeless families has nearly doubled in the past 2 years; many of these Americans are newly unemployed and caught in a vertex of downward mobility. When the Reagan administration claims that the homeless are a problem "even in the best of times" and suggests that many are that way "by choice," it becomes obvious that we must react quickly to this insensitivity.

The administration's record of response to the problem in the past has been ineffective and in the future will prove to be even less so. The solution was the creation of a task force on the homeless, which endowed the Federal Emergency Management Agency with $210 million for it to disperse, but which has only touched the surface of the problem. Meanwhile the administration is proposing deep cutbacks for operating and repairing the Nation's 1.2 million public housing units, and plans to eliminate eight other housing and urban aid programs. Excluded from the 1986 fiscal budget is the program which finances construction of housing for the elderly and handicapped, and slated for elimination are urban and housing development action grants. These proposed cuts are a blatant abandonment of a 50-year Federal commitment to housing lower income Americans. It is obviously illogical to abandon this committment when homelessness is on the upsurge nationwide.

Among other proposed cuts are Federal subsidies, which finance local public housing for approximately half of their operating expenses, by $240 million to $1 billion. Urban development action grants, which are used by cities to obtain private investments for downtown projects, would be completely dropped. The basic question which needs to be urgently confronted is whether human beings in the United States have a right to adequate shelter. It is obvious that this administration does not believe that they do. I differ. I urge my colleagues to resist any more budget cuts in housing assistance.●

A TRIBUTE TO THE SPIRIT OF THE UKRAINIAN NATION

HON. H. JAMES SAXTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize the fortitude of the people of Ukraine as Ukrainians throughout the world celebrate the 67th Anniversary of the proclamation of the independence of Ukraine.

On January 22, 1918, the Ukrainian Parliament declared that the Ukrainian National Republic is an independent, free, and sovereign state. Unfortunately, this freedom was all too short, as the Bolsheviks forced their way into power, despite the valient efforts of the out-numbered Ukrainian Army.

However, the spirit of hope remained alive. Despite the tyranny of Stalin and his horrible, manmade famine, this spirit could not be suppressed. Despite brutal oppression by the Nazis and the continued occupation by the Soviets, this spirit of hope persists. Despite the lack of basic human rights, such as the right to practice one's religion, and despite continuous intimidation by the KGB, hope endures.

The Ukrainians' determination to regain their right to self-determination reminds us not only how precious freedom is, but also how important it is to pledge our support for those living under the yoke of Soviet domination.

In this small way, I would like to let the people of Ukraine know that their struggle for freedom and their harsh oppression by the Soviet Union is not forgotten. Indeed, the resolve of freedom-loving peoples everywhere is strengthened by the courage of the oppressed and the cruelty of the oppressor.●

JUDY BECHTLER, WASTE FIGHTER IN THE DOD

HON. LANE EVANS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. EVANS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, at a time when the Defense Department is regularly being derided for mismanagement and inefficiency in its acquisition process, seldom are the good works of loyal, hard working employees of the Army or other services brought to the attention of Congress and the American public. Therefore, I was pleased to see that Ms. Judy Bechtler, a resident of my congressional district and a contract specialist in the Army's procurement directorate in Rock Island, IL, recently received the Blanch Witte Memorial Award.

This prestigious award is presented annually by the National Contract Management Association [NCMA] to a nonsupervisory employee of the Government or industry who makes a significant accomplishment in the acquisition field. Nominated for the award by Mr. George T. Nickolas, a member of my 17th Congressional District Veterans Advisory Council and a supervisor at the U.S. Army Armament, Munitions, and Chemical Command in Rock Island, Ms. Bechtler becomes the first woman and the first Army employee to receive this formal recognition.

The events leading to this nomination are unique, particularly when one considers the many barriers to cost-effective and competitive acquisition of military spare parts and weapons. Ms. Bechtler was assigned the responsibility of procuring power supply units which had been costing the Government $15,000 each. Twelve potential suppliers of these power units were issued solicitations, and revisions in DOD inspection and acceptance clauses were cleared as Ms. Bechtler sought to ensure competition in this procurement.

Thinking they were involved in a sole source solicitation, the original supplier of power units made an initial offer of $17,170 per unit. Later, this offer was revised to $11,886 per unit, a 44-percent decrease. Eventually, the contract award was made to another private supplier for $9,697.78 per unit. This amounted to a total savings to the Government and to taxpayers of $739,749.78 from the original offer. In addition, and probably more importantly, a competitive atmosphere had been established.

Because of Judy Bechtler's persistence and commitment to efficient management techniques, a single source procurement environment was eliminated and potentially millions of dollars will be saved. I am hopeful that the example set by Ms. Bechtler will offer other employees of the armed services incentive to emphasize efficient and cost-effective acquisition practices.●

A SALUTE TO COL. CHARLES H. MERRILL

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with singular pleasure that I bring to the attention of our colleagues in the Congress an outstanding constituent of mine who on Friday, February 22, will be honored at the Pentagon upon his retirement at the conclusion of 40 years of military service.

He is Col. Charles H. Merrill, U.S. Air Force Reserve, a resident of Skaneateles, NY.

Colonel Merrill has continuously served our Nation since the age of 17 when he enlisted as a private in the Army Air Corps. His distinguished military career has encompassed service in the U.S. Air Force, the Air Force Reserve, and the New York Air National Guard, in addition to his service with the Army Air Corps.

He is concluding his uniformed career with a reserve duty assignment in the Office of the Secretary of the Air Force, Headquarters USAF, here in Washington where he has served with distinction since June 1981. His awards include the Meritorious Service Medal, and his exceptional service in the Office of the Secretary has resulted in a recommendation for the award of the Legion of Merit.

Skilled in the use of several languages, Colonel Merrill has, through the years, performed as a goodwill ambassador to foreign visitors to America, and he has been a member of the White House Speakers' Bureau. His record of civic service to our Central New York community is outstanding. His leadership posts have included that of president of the Syracuse World Affairs Council, chairman of the Committees of International Relations and Congressional Action with the Greater Syracuse Chamber of Commerce, chairman of the Marcy State Hospital Board of Visitors, Onandaga County's international relations representative, and vice president of the Onandaga County Chapter, Reserve Officers Association of the United States. His memberships in community service organizations and his contributions to the programs of those organizations are many.

Colonel Merrill was vice president of the Chemical Bank of Syracuse, an assistant vice president of the Marine Midland Bank, and a member of the Board of Governors, the American Institute of Banking.

Since 1975, he has been administrator of Onandaga County, serving the people and County Executive John H. Mulroy with dedication and effectiveness.

Mr. speaker, I am honored to bring to the attention of this body Colonel Merrill's four decades of service to our country and to the people I am privileged to represent.●

DESIGNATING MARCH 20 AS NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing, in partnership with Congressman EDWARD R. MADIGAN of Illinois, the ranking minority member of the House Agriculture Committee, a resolution to designate March 20 as National Agriculture Day for 1985. As chairman of the Agriculture Committee, I am happy to note that more than 100 of our colleagues in both parties have already joined as cosponsors, and I hope that we will soon have the total of at least 218 sponsors needed to assure passage of this measure.

The legislation will authorize and request the President to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe the day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The purpose behind this resolution, which is identical to legislation which we have been passing annually in recent years, is simple but very significant. By writing this resolution into law, we underline the formal recognition Congress gives to the importance of our Nation's most basic industry to the men and women involved in agriculture and to all of our citizens.

National observance of Agriculture Day, which is coordinated by the nonpartisan Agriculture Council of America, provides a chance for giving all Americans a better understanding of the industry which—when all its segments are considered—provides about one-fifth of the Nation's jobs as well as supplying our food and fiber.

Many American farmers are in economic trouble today, and we are all deeply concerned with the effort to help solve those problems. But at the same time, we want the people of this country to remember what an amazing service they get from agriculture—the world's best diet at the lowest cost in our history in terms of the amount of wages required to buy the average citizen's groceries. I hope that by speedy passage of this resolution, and by continued cooperation among all the groups which help celebrate Agriculture Day, we can make the 1985 observance a further step toward better understanding of what agriculture means to America.●

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the contamination of our underground water supplies is one of the most serious and insidious health and environmental threats in south Florida. The threat of underground water contamination looms large as all sorts of foul-smelling, suspected pollutants trickle into the underground Biscayne aquifer, the sole source of drinking water for all of Dade, most of Broward, and part of Palm Beach Counties.

The nature of groundwater pollution is not unique to south Florida. Contaminants are being found in the groundwater of every State and are being detected with increasing frequency. In sampling of aquifers nationwide, EPA has found many substances which have been linked to human health hazards, including cancers.

Despite concern with regard to groundwater pollution, the Federal approach has been hesitant, uncertain, and indirect. For example, there is no explicit national legislative mandate to protect groundwater quality. In addition, laws and programs vary in the ways they address groundwater, and programs to protect groundwater are not integrated.

To help fashion a comprehensive approach that marshals the combined resources of the Federal, State and local governments, I have joined with other Members in cosponsoring the Sole Source Aquifer Amendments of 1985. This bill puts forward many unique and creative management plans necessary to effectively protect aquifers nationwide. Under this approach, localities would design plans for protecting the sole source aquifer. These plans would be approved by the EPA Administrator, and Federal funding would be made available for the implementation of such plans. No new or complicated regulatory structure would be required.

Our drinking water is vital to our health. We must continue to work to strengthen the laws protecting our limited water resource.●

FUTURE HOMEMAKERS OF AMERICA

HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I join with the members of the Future Homemakers of America in celebrating their 40th anniversary. Next week is National FHA Week and the theme of this observance is "Future Homemakers of America: 40 Years of Real Learning."

Future Homemakers of America is a national organization cosponsored by the U.S. Department of Education and the American Home Economics Association. The goal of this organization is to help youth assume active roles in society through home economics education in the areas of personal growth, family life, vocational preparation and community development.

Since its founding in 1945, over 6 million youths have participated in FHA programs. The national membership now totals 400,000 in 12,500 chapters. Males have always been involved throughout the organization's 40 years. However, male participation has increased noticeably in the last 11 years and 9 percent of the national membership this year is male. Four of this year's 14 national officers are young men and 11 have served in this capacity since the first male national officer was elected in 1973.

Future Homemakers of America is attempting to broaden its appeal and operates on the premise that everyone is a homemaker and everyone contributes to the well-being of a home, in whatever form it takes. Today's young men and women need to be prepared for roles as both homemakers and wage earners. The emphasis in Future Homemakers of America is on helping teens learn how to balance family life and a career.

An issue of major importance to teenagers is peer pressure. Member of FHA use positive peer pressure—called peer education—to encourage teenagers to seek out and share information which will help them make informed and responsible decisions. The two national peer education projects—"The Student Body" and "Families and Futures"—are highly successful programs. "The Student Body" was piloted in 1979 in response to the need to develop good nutrition and fitness habits among people, along with the knowledge of the effectiveness of the peer education approach to learning. This program has reached over 250,000 teens since its inception. "Families and Futures", cosponsored by FHA and the March of Dimes Birth Defects Foundation, promotes peer education and provides information to future adults and potential parents that will help them make responsible decisions regarding family and individual health. This program is an outgrowth of the program called "Healthy Babies: Chance or Choice?" that was established in 1975 in response to the national teenage pregnancy crisis.

In the Second Congressional District of Kentucky, which I have the privilege of representing, there are 43 chapters and 2,181 FHA members. I am pleased to announce that the Kentucky State FHA President for 1984-85 is Lisa Nally of Marion County—located in the second district. Last year chapters in my home district worked on projects in a variety of areas: "The Student Body", work with children and the elderly, rape prevention, drug and alcohol abuse, and community projects (UNICEF, Crusade for Children, CARE, Arthrities Foundation, and March of Dimes and cerebral palsy collections).

I am proud to have received National Honorary Membership in the Future Homemakers of America and I consider it an honor and a privilege to be associated with this fine organization. At this time I would like to commend the members of the Future Homemakers of America for their achievements of the past 40 years and wish them continued success in the years ahead.●

MS. JODY ANN LIUFAKKA, CONGRESSIONAL AWARD GOLD MEDAL WINNER

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, the Congressional Award Program recognizes the initiative, achievement, service to others, and attainment of excellence in young persons ages 14 through 23. It is an extraordinary means of both inspiring young people in personal improvement and service to others, as well as a means of recognizing young people for their extraordinary efforts in voluntary leadership and personal excellence.

On February 6, 49 young Americans received the Congressional Gold Award at a magnificent ceremony in the Cannon caucus room—49 young people whose own efforts have earned them a special mark of attainment and a place in history.

Among these young people, I am very proud to say, was Jody Ann Liupakka of Esko, MN, in my Eighth Congressional District. I was proud to present Jody to the Joint Leadership Commission and to the assembled delegation in what I know is one of the proudest moments in Jody's life and a very proud moment for her parents, Frank and Jane. I would like to include in the RECORD at this point the details of the Gold Award commendations, a record of her efforts in the three areas of voluntary public service, personal development, physical fitness, and expeditions. It is a record to be envied, one which was truly deserving of the extraordinary Gold Award which she justifiably earned. I want to, once again, offer Jody my heartfelt congratulations, as well as my sincere admiration for her achievements.

MS. JODY ANN LIUPAKKA, CONCORDIA COLLEGE—MINNESOTA 8TH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT, MINNESOTA—AGE 21

GOLD AWARD COMMENDATION

Jody Ann Liupakka has given 840 hours during the past three years to voluntary community service, personal development and physical fitness programs.

Her advisor, Burton O. Laine, University of Minnesota Associate Professor and County Extension Agent, describes Jody as a person who can share her talents and improve them by helping others: "she is a very responsible and hard-working individual . . . her public service record shows real commitment."

The Congress of the United States recognizes Jody's voluntary leadership and personal excellence with the presentation of a gold Congressional Award by the Joint Congressional Leadership and Representative James L. Oberstar.

VOLUNTARY PUBLIC SERVICE

400 hours counseling and providing support to anorexia nervosa patient, researching information on the disease, attending workshops and sharing information with others. Tutored college peers, advised on study habits, communication, and problem solving; planned programs to present to nursing home as member of Christian Outreach Team: worked Church Youth Days at Concordia College, helping visiting high school students become familiar with the college programs and campus activities.

PERSONAL DEVELOPMENT

210 hours as nursery school aid, demonstrating activities, preparing visual aids and gaining an understanding of child behavior. As vice-president-elect of the National Honor Society of Home Economics. Phi Upsilon Omicron, helped develop organization and communication skills through fund-raising endeavors, planning the chapter's activities such as food requirements for college dance marathon, and practicing home economist skills.

PHYSICAL FITNESS AND EXPEDITIONS

230 hours planning daily diets in accordance with American Diabetes Association as part of weight control plan; maintaining regular exercise schedule; training for five-mile race; participating in college intramural singles and doubles tennis program.

On October 20, 1984, at the Proctor, MN, High School Auditorium, it was my pleasure to present congressional awards to Seventh and Eighth Congressional District young people who also participated in the program. I am proud of their accomplishments. I want to congratulate each of them for the superb personal effort they made to attain these awards and urge others to continue their participation in this excellent program: Eve Marie Wiitanen, Esko, MN—Silver Award; Michael Robert Carl, Proctor, MN—Bronze Award; Leah Marie Nesgoda, Duluth, MN—Bronze Award; Amy Jean Stangeland, Duluth—Bronze Award; June Beth Stangeland, Duluth—Bronze Award; Patti Ann Oja, Cromwell, MN—Bronze Award.●

A BILL TO REPEAL THE EARNING ON SOCIAL SECURITY

HON. ALFRED A. (AL) McCANDLESS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to repeal the earnings limit on Social Security. I feel that this earnings limitation discourages senior citizens' efforts to better their own condition, to remain independent, and to maintain their sense of pride in doing valuable work.

This limit is an oppressive tax on earnings above the exempt amounts. The Social Security beneficiary loses $1 of benefits for each $2 of earnings above the exempt amount, and must also pay Social Security taxes on the earned income. This results in an unusually high marginal tax rate of at least 57 percent on earned income in excess of the exempt amounts.

At present there is an annual limitation for two age groups on what they can earn before any reduction is made in Social Security benefits. For those age 62-64 the limit is $5,400, and for those age 65-69, it is $7,320. There is now no limit on earnings for those age 70 and over. This is illogical. Why should we discourage people with know-how and experience from working for a period of 5 to 8 years, and then give them the go-ahead at age 70 to reenter the labor force?

The earnings test dampens work incentives, causing some older workers to deliberately hold down their work earnings to avoid being penalized.

The earnings limit discriminates against working people and work income. Other sources of income, such as dividends and interest, do not count toward the earnings cap.

Repealing the earnings test would also result in a great reduction in the administrative costs of Social Security. Identifying overpayments and collecting from those older people who have earned too much, and adjudicating claims for forgiveness of the amount overpaid when there is a financial hardship, require a lot of man-hours at the Social Security Administration. Eliminating the need for this complex system would save tax dollars and help pay for the cost of any additional benefits paid.

Because most of the additional income received by older workers would be spent, sales taxes to State and local governments would increase.

Additionally, because the beneficiaries would have more disposable income, food stamps for the aged would tend to decline, the need for subsidized low-income housing for the aged would be reduced, and dependence on social services and welfare services would be lessened.

Mr. Speaker, most people of retirement age really want to be independent and to at least have the option of gainful employment. Our laws should not discourage older people from working. Let's repeal the Social Security earnings limitation.●

IN HONOR OF MR. HAROLD RICHTERMAN

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity today to recognize the accomplishments of one of our outstanding leading professionals and my good friend, Mr. Harold Richterman. Mr. Richterman was the distinguished recipient of the American Foundation for the Blind's Migel Medal. He was chosen to receive this annual award from the foundation because of his outstanding and immeasurable contributions and long-term commitment to the blind and visually impaired citizens of this Nation. Through his strong commitment and dedication to the foundation, he has significantly improved the lives of the blind and visually impaired people.

National Industries for the Blind, which Richterman joined in 1969, is a national nonprofit organization which allocates Government orders for goods and services to 100 affiliated workshops employing more than 5,500 blind and multihandicapped people. The division of rehabilitation services assists the workshops in establishing evaluation and training programs for multihandicapped blind people.

Before joining NIB, Richterman was a mobility instructor at the Industrial Home for the Blind and later was named director of rehabilitation services. He has also completed assignments in the United States and abroad for the Office of Services for the Blind, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

Richterman has served as a member of the executive board of the American Association of Workers for the Blind and as a past president of its New York chapter.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed appropriate that we reflect on the deeds and achievements of people who have contributed to the quality of life.●

A TRIBUTE TO MR. FREDDIE FUNG

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to bring to the attention of my colleagues the following statement which describes the fine work of Mr. Freddie Fung and announces his selection as Humanitarian of the Year by the Easter Seal Society of Alameda County.

The statement follows:

The Easter Seal Society of Alameda County has named Mr. Freddie Fung as the ninth "Humanitarian of the Year."

Each year the Society considers citizens who have either made significant contribution to helping people in making a difference in the lives of others less fortunate than themselves, or who throughout the years have been involved in supporting Easter Seal.

Mr. Fung's personal honors are numerous. He was awarded the U.S. Navy Meritorious Public Service Citation in February 1970 (which is the second highest honor awarded to a civilian) for his volunteer involvement at Oak Knoll Naval Hospital-Oakland; "Man of the Year" award from the City of Hope in April 1980; and the Citizen of the Year" award from the East Bay Diabetic Association in June 1978.

Mr. Fung, who is presently General Manager of Trader Vics Restaurant in Emeryville, California, has been a major contributor of both his time and resources to the East Bay Diabetic Association; the Alameda Cancer League; Oakland Symphony; Paramount Theater Association; Oakland Ballet; Children's Hospital-Oakland; Clausen House; Oakland Museum; Oakland Zoological Society; Boys Club of Oakland; Chinese Hospital-San Francisco; City of Hope; U.C. California Athletic Association; Stanford Women's Club-East Bay; and the Easter Seal Society of Alameda County.

Mr. Freddie Fung is an outstanding citizen who has given unstintingly of his time, talent, and concern for the advancement of opportunities for the people of our community.●

GEN. THADDEUS KOSCIUSZKO—A GREAT SOLDIER AND PATRIOT

HON. FRANK ANNUNZIO
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, February 12 is the 239th anniversary of the birth of Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko, the great Revolutionary War hero, who fought courageously for the cause of American independence, and symbolizes so well the contributions made by millions of Polish-Americans to our country through their skill, ingenuity, and patriotism.

No rollcall of the great heroes of the American Revolution who joined together in the fight against tyrannical rule would be complete without the name of General Kosciuszko, who voluntarily entered the Continental Army, and distinguished himself in several battles where victories were crucial in achieving independence. Although he was not a native American, General Kosciuszko's selfless actions were held in such high esteem that Congress bestowed on him the rights and privileges of American citizenship and the rank of brigadier general.

Even before our Declaration of Independence was signed, this young Polish officer sailed across the Atlantic and appeared before Gen. George Washington, to volunteer his military skill and training and his scientific knowledge of engineering to help create an effective fighting force from the largely untrained and inexperienced Continental Army.

General Kosciuszko was commissioned as a colonel of engineers, and constructed many military fortifications, displaying his abilities as a military strategist particularly at the Battle of Saratoga and in the Hudson Valley. Throughout the long and bleak years of the American Revolution, Kosciuszko devoted himself with great zeal in helping General Washington win the war, and Thomas Jefferson hailed him by saying: "He was as pure a son of liberty as I have ever known and of that liberty which is to go to all and not the few or to the rich alone."

Kosciuszko spent 6 years in the Continental Army, and returned to Poland in 1784 to participate in his own country's struggle for Polish independence. He was certainly among the bravest and the ablest of his kind, and earned the respect and admiration of Americans as well as his own countrymen.

Mr. Speaker, it is an honor for me to join with Polish-Americans in the 11th Congressional District of Illinois which I am honored to represent, and Americans of Polish descent throughout this Nation, in paying tribute to General Kosciuszko and his dedication to the cause of liberty.●

SENATE—Monday, February 18, 1985

The Senate met at 12 noon and was called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. GRAMM].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

CELEBRATING GEORGE WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY

Let us pray.

Almighty God, on this day when we celebrate the memory of the father of our country, may we remember the faith which motivated and sustained him. May we heed his conviction that "It is impossible to rightly govern the world without God and the Bible." May the spontaneous way in which he concluded his oath of office with the words "So help me God" remind us of our dependence upon You. Renew in us the faith of our fathers that we may live and labor in its light and truth. In His name who is the Light of the World. Amen.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order of the Senate of January 24, 1901, as modified on February 7, 1985, the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS], having been appointed by the Vice President, will now read Washington's Farewell Address.

To the people of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite movement, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen, in the negotiations by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political system is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of factions, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reigns of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of fraction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one party against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern: some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by unsurpation; for through this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, but ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation within its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachment for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumberable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defense posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of may administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible to my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES,
17th September, 1796.

COMMENDATION OF SENATOR HAWKINS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I wish to commend my colleague from Florida for the excellent reading of Washington's Farewell Address.

I can assure the listeners that reading this is probably the most difficult thing of this kind that anyone ever undertook.

There has been a lot of argument, as we all know, about whether or not George Washington wrote this address himself; but it is assumed now that he did, because the final version as was read today is in his penmanship.

However, the wonderful thing about this address is not the way it was written or the expressions or the words used but the fact that he devoted this speech to reminding his fellow citizens of his great love of liberty, his great devotion to and love of his country.

He warned his fellow citizens against the things that could happen at that time; and, unfortunately, many of these things have happened, to the detriment of our country. He particularly called the attention of his fellow citizens to the responsibility of this country in living in the world that existed then, and I think his words are still applicable today, to enjoy business with other countries but to stay out of their politics. I think we would do well today to pay attention to what George Washington told us.

I want to remind my colleagues that this is the first time in the history of the Senate that a Senator from the State of Florida has read Washington's Farewell Address; and, if I am not mistaken, it is the first time that a lady has read it. It would be a great compliment to him, and I feel a great kinship to her, because to her State and to my State came the first people from outside what is now the United States.

I commend my friend from Florida, who undoubtedly has had some of the sunshine that dominates my State, because of the warmth of her remarks and the beautiful way in which she read this address.

[Applause in the galleries.]

Mrs. HAWKINS. I thank the Senator, my good friend from Arizona.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M. TOMORROW

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now stand in recess until 2 p.m. tomorrow.

Thereupon, at 12:43 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Tuesday, February 19, 1985, at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, February 19, 1985

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Albert J. Contons, pastor, St. Peter's Church, South Boston, MA, offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, Lord of all peoples, we pray Your divine guidance for the Members of this august body. From their midst may the spirit of peace and justice flow like a mighty river pouring out its blessings upon all Americans and upon all the nations of the Earth.

We pray in a special way for the people of Lithuania, who commemorate the anniversary of the declaration of their independence in 1918.

With fellow Americans of Lithuanian descent we pray that the aspirations of this valiant people for the blessings of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness may once again be fulfilled.

Heavenly Father, may Your truth, justice, and love bring forth an abundant harvest of peace and respect for human rights among all nations. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

REV. ALBERT J. CONTONS

(Mr. ANNUNZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, it is a genuine pleasure for me to welcome to our Nation's Capital, Rev. Albert J. Contons, pastor of St. Peter's Church in South Boston, MA, who offered the opening prayer.

Father Contons is the Episcopal vicar for the Boston region, and the president of the Lithuanian Catholic Priests' League of America, and it is fitting that he joins us here today, for February 16 marked the 67th anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day.

Father Contons was born in South Boston, and attended the Boston Latin School. He studied philosophy and theology at St. John's Seminary in Brighton, MA, and was ordained on May 6, 1948.

He has continued his advanced studies in Canada and France, and has been an instructor at St. Sebastian's School in Newton, MA, teaching French, Latin, and theology. Father Contons has been very active in the Lithuanian affairs in the United States, and has served as the national spiritual adviser to the Knights of Lithuania. He has authored several articles and books, including the English text for the "History of St. Peter's Parish in South Boston," and the Knights of Lithuania Leadership Manual.

I want to thank Father Contons for being with us today, and to wish him continuing success in his dedicated work in the church.

IMPORT SURCHARGE

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, the move toward freer world trade has ground to a halt. Little progress has been made on the mounting list of trade problems which confront the world marketplace. Our trading partners do little more than pay lipservice to the idea of free trade, and our continued support for the current trading system brings us little more than a small degree of respect and ever increasing quantities of red ink.

The time has come to draw the line and ask our trading partners to practice what they preach. We can no longer accept years of fruitless negotiations while our markets are flooded with cheaper imports and our exports are excluded by a host of foreign trade barriers.

Today I am introducing a bill which will provide an incentive for reluctant trading partners to enter into serious trade negotiations with us. My bill will assess a 20-percent surcharge on U.S. imports from all nations. However, the surcharge is removed for those nations willing to enter into a bilateral free trade agreement with us. Those nations which agree will continue to enjoy the benefits of free trade with the United States, while those nations who do not negotiate will have the surcharge remain in place.

Free trade only exists when all countries offer equal benefits and undertake equal responsibilities. My bill will provide the needed impetus for a new trade movement and I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

AUTHORIZING THE SPEAKER TO APPOINT TWO MEMBERS TO REPRESENT THE HOUSE AT GEORGE WASHINGTON BIRTHDAY CEREMONIES, FEBRUARY 22, 1985

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it shall be in order for the Speaker to appoint two Members of the House, one upon the recommendation of the minority leader, to represent the House of Representatives at appropriate ceremonies on February 22, 1985, the birthday of George Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE TO AMERICAN FARMERS: DROP DEAD

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, when the President came to this Chamber and addressed the Nation on the state of the Union recently, calling for a second American revolution, it was unclear what this meant for the farmers of our Nation. Thereafter, his Budget Director, Mr. Stockman, delivered the message to American farmers: The President's message to the American family farmer is "drop dead."

What a departure from the true spirit of our Founding Fathers. As Daniel Webster observed:

> Let us never forget that the cultivation of the earth is the most important labor of man. Unstable is the future of that country which has lost its taste for agriculture. If there is one lesson in history which is unmistakable, it is that national strength lies very near the soil.

Mr. Speaker, the American farmer is in a state of economic depression. In a short while, Members of Congress will address the Nation on the state of American agriculture. I solicit your attention to the urgency of the crisis.

BLACKMAIL HAS NO PLACE HERE

(Mr. MARLENEE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, blackmail has no place in a reasoned legislative process. Yet we have the Director, the Director of OMB, David Stockman, holding the knife at the jugular vein of our agricultural producers and their representatives. OMB, in collusion with the Department of Agriculture, is drawing blood, drawing blood by not allowing the necessary personnel, even in the Farmers Home Administration, to even complete those responsibilities with which it is charged. Conspiracy, road blocks of bureaucracy, holding or withholding of necessary funds and credit in this crisis for the purpose of beating some of us who represent the farmers into a submission has no place in this democracy, in this Republic or in the legislative process.

THE NEXT ATTACK SUBMARINE

(Mr. AuCOIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, one of the more controversial new defense programs is the new attack submarine, called the SSN-21.

There are two schools of thought on this ship.

On the one hand, there are those who say the Los Angeles class we now have is the best in the world. They say we can't afford to start an expensive new program.

On the other hand, there are those who say we can do a lot better if we start with an all-new design, and the threat requires that we do it.

There's truth on both sides. My colleagues know that I have never been hesitant to oppose major weapons I believe are unnecessary or destabilizing or both. But in this case, it seems to me the weight of the evidence falls on the side of the advocates. It seems to me this ship is both necessary and stabilizing.

We have to maintain control of the sea if we're to reduce the danger of nuclear escalation. From all experience, submarines are the most effective way to do it. If we are to deter naval aggression quickly and decisively, in the face of Soviet antisubmarine technology which eventually could become substantial, and in the face of the very long leadtime a submarine program needs, it seems to me the SSN-21 is something we have to do.

If the cost gets out of hand, then it goes without saying that the matter would have to be reevaluated. But if the program stays on its present course, for my part I recommend we go ahead with it.

SHOULD WE DISPOSE OF CONRAIL

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of Transportation has made a decision for the ultimate disposition of Conrail. Before we conclude that the long-awaited arrival of the Conrail trail and train to the station has happened, let us examine some of the issues that are going to be newly debated on the floor of this House.

We cannot tell by this decision whether or not the substantial best interests of the employees of Conrail have been taken into account or whether the profitability that has been shown by Conrail has been taken into account or whether the future of the rail system in this country has been taken into account.

We must, as a matter not only of the economics involved, conclude that the Dole decision is the best for Conrail, but also for questions involving national security. I ask every Member of Congress to go slow in his or her deliberations as to the decision on Conrail. There is much debate left on this issue.

I thank the Speaker.

TIME TO MELT THE "ICE" JAM

(Mr. ERDREICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, the State of Alabama faces a shutdown of all new interstate highway construction at the end of this month because Congress has failed to approve the interstate cost estimate-interstate substitute cost estimate [ICE-ISCE]. Alabama and some 40 other States were scheduled to get a year's allotment of interstate funds in October 1, 1983, and again on October 1, 1984. But some 239 projects, amounting to over $1,262 billion nationwide and over $144 million in Alabama, are being held up because the legislation required to release the money has not been passed by Congress.

The money, which comes from the highway trust fund, is supposed to be passed on to States every 2 years. Before this can be done, however, Congress must pass the interstate cost estimate [ICE] of the funding needed for interstate work and an interstate substitute cost estimate [ISCE] of funding for highway projects the States have chosen to replace proposed interstate construction.

Approval of the ICE was once a routine legislative procedure. But attempts to include pork barrel demonstration projects have caused a dramatic and needless rise in the amount included in the highway trust fund and has made passage of the ICE all but impossible.

Under the interstate program, States pay for Federal projects out of their own pockets and are reimbursed later by the Federal Highway Administration. Congress' failure to pass the ICE, however, means the States' allotments cannot be released and has caused serious cash-flow problems in many States, including Alabama.

I have cosponsored legislation to reform the congressional approval process and prevent future logjams of congressional action on the ICE because of attempts to attach pork barrel proposals. Under the legislation, Congress has from January to October 1 of each year to review and revise the ICE-ISCE submitted by the Department of Transportation. If the Congress fails to release the funds by October 1, however, the bill authorizes the Secretary of Transportation to release the moneys administratively.

It is unfair to hold up essential and needed interstate construction and repair in Alabama and across the country because attempts to attach other bills have turned congressional action in ICE into a political football.

I urge that swift action be taken by my colleagues in the House to pass this legislation and allow necessary highway work in Alabama and across the Nation to continue.

It's time to melt the "ICE" jam.

GRACE COMMISSION RESOLUTION

(Mr. STRANG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Speaker, the President's private sector survey on cost control, the Grace Commission, developed 2,478 specific recommendations for cost reductions and/or revenue enhancements. It took 1½ years of detailed study into the workings of the Federal bureaucracy. If fully implemented, the Grace Commission report projects a potential cost reduction of $424 billion.

Each of us may not agree with every suggestion set forth in the Grace report. But that should not prevent us from requiring the committees of the House of Representatives to at least look at the recommendations for potential cost savings. By modifying the House rules, we can ask our standing committees to review these recommendations. Passage of the resolution I am introducing today will do just that.

If we are honest with ourselves, the comments by J. Peter Grace as reported in the New York Times are right on target:

> Congress has confused the axiom "waste not, want not." President Reagan's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control has shown Congress how to "waste not," but Congress to its discredit, has shown that it "wants not" such advice.
> The historical alternative by Congress to cutting spending has been to increase taxes. As a result, the annual income taxes paid by the average family have increased 32 times faster than their income. Instead of covering current deficits, increased revenues invariably are used to fuel more spending.

We never said cutting spending was going to be easy—hard problems seldom are solved by easy solutions. But the time has come for Congress to stop clowning around and get serious.

Surely our committees can take some time in the course of their routine hearings on legislation at least to consider the recommendations within their jurisdiction, and either accept them, modify them, or reject them, and let us know their reasoning as a part of the regular legislative reports. That is not asking too much, given the time and effort over 2,000 volunteers devoted to this project.

If only one-fourth of the projected $424 billion savings over 3 years is within the realm of possibility, the Federal Government could realize a savings of $106 billion. Isn't that worth scrutiny by our committees?

PROVIDING A TAX CREDIT FOR CONTRIBUTIONS TO REDUCE THE PUBLIC DEBT

(Mr. CONTE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, there's a commercial on the television these days with McGruff the Crime Dog telling us how we can help prevent robberies. After advising us of certain safety precautions, he says: "Help take a bite out of crime."

Very few people know, Mr. Speaker, that I am a great fan of McGruff the Crime Dog. Some people even tell me that I sound like him—and there are a lot of similarities between McGruff and what we in the Congress have to do this year. McGruff wants to reduce crime. Congress wants to reduce the deficit.

I'm pleased to announce that our task will be made simpler with a bill I am introducing today. I call it the Conte contribution credit, and the bill allows all taxpayers to take a 25-percent credit against tax for contributions to reduce the deficit.

Although present law allows a deduction for contributions to charity (and donations to reduce the deficit are deductible), present law only benefits taxpayers who itemize deductions or those who take the "above the line" deduction—which is limited to only $300 in donations this year and expires in 1987. More incentives are needed, and my bill provides them.

I am enclosing for the RECORD a more detailed summary of my bill, Mr. Speaker. I urge my colleagues to support this bill—support the Conte contribution credit—and help take a bite out of the deficit.

HOUSE SHOULD SEAT MR. McINTYRE

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I have here a resolution of privilege that I have every reason to believe, if introduced at this moment, would in fact be sustained as a resolution of privilege and therefore a vote would be taken on the House floor today.

It deals with the case of Mr. McIntyre and the unwillingness of this body to seat him in the seat which is rightfully his as certified by the State of Indiana.

I will not introduce the resolution today because a lot of Members are not here in town, have not been informed about the fact that we could have business, but I will say this, Mr. Speaker: The patience is wearing rather thin and the fact that we can bring this to the floor in this manner on any day, whether it be pro forma session or not, ought to be a signal to the Members that a lot of us around here are very disturbed the way this body is acting with regard to its constitutional behavior and it is high time that Rick McIntyre be given his seat, be allowed to sit among us and vote among us as a Member duly elected, which he is.

THIS HOUSE HAS AN OBLIGATION TO SEAT "RICK" McINTYRE

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, the House undertook a very dangerous precedent in its last session in refusing to seat a Member from Indiana who had now won the election and won the recount and is certified by the State of Indiana. The case of Rich McIntyre should worry every American because if the votes of the people of Indiana do not count, then conceivably the votes of Colorado or Massachusetts or Georgia or Pennsylvania would not count. In many ways, Mr. Speaker, one can conclude that this is now an unconstitutional body which has decided to preempt the votes of the people of Indiana and to deny them representation.

Later during the session today I will read into the RECORD a series of editorials from the Washington Post, from Indiana newspapers, from Texas newspapers, from across the country that say again and again this House has an obligation to seat Rick McIntyre; this House has an obligation to let the people of Indiana be represented and this House is acting in a very dangerous manner in not seating him during the process of looking at that election.

It is unprecedented and I hope in the next week or so the House will reconsider its decision.

ABUSE OF THE CORPORATE TAKEOVER PROCESS THREATENS FABRIC OF OUR ECONOMIC SYSTEM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JONES] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, abuse of the corporate takeover process has become a serious problem. It threatens the very fabric of the economic system in the United States. It is time for Congress to evaluate the explosion of hostile takeovers which are inhibiting the competitive ability of American business in today's world markets.

Any proposed solution, however, must focus on the whole, rather than concentrating on particular symptoms. Mr. Speaker, the legislation I am introducing today seeks to accomplish this goal by focusing on the tax advantages available to those undertaking hostile corporate takeovers. This legislation seeks to take away the kindle fueling the fires of merger mania.

This legislation expands upon an earlier bill most members of the Oklahoma delegation joined with me in introducing on February 6, 1985. My new bill, in addition to taxing profits made through greenmail at 50 percent, would also disallow the interest deduction on indebtedness that arises from the use of junior obligations, commonly called junk bonds.

Undoubtedly, Mr. Speaker, you have read about and heard of the proliferation of hostile takeover activity in the corporate sector, and particularly within the energy industry. While there are a number of national policy issues which arise from this activity, I am most specifically concerned about the takeover entrepreneur—a speculator who purchases a sigificant block of shares in a publicly held corporation, in order to threaten the corporation into buying back the shares at a premium, and who finances such bootstrap, bust up transactions with high-yield, low-grade junior obligations. Mr. Speaker, these tactics serve to profit the takeover entrepreneur at the expense of the basic constituencies served by American corporations: the long-term investor shareholders, customers, employees, pensioners, suppliers, and communities in which they operate.

Furthermore, abusive takeover schemes have created an epidemic of takeover fear among our Nation's corporations that have resulted in an obsession with the short term and the slighting of long range planning. Not only have such abusive takeover attempts impacted the fate of the target corporations, but it entails questionable use of Tax Code incentives. Certainly, at a time when legitimate business activities are hard pressed to find available, reasonably priced credit, it seems ill advised to allow the use of these highly speculative obligations for the financing of abusive corporate acquisitions.

Junk bonds are high risk, unsecured instruments that pay large yields and are ultimately secured only by the assets of the target company. These financing instruments are being used as a means to take over healthy, profitable companies to accomplish nothing more than to bust them up for their dismemberment value. It is time Congress considers whether it is appropriate for our Internal Revenue Code to allow an interest deduction for interest paid or carried when the underlying instrument is simply an equity contribution.

The legislation disallows an interest deduction for indebtedness issued in the form of junior obligations. The legislation defines junior obligations (junk bonds) as indebtedness that is rated by a national rating agency at least 2 points below the ratings given to the target company's other substantial class of indebtedness, or that meet certain other criteria related to either the right of payment or value of assets. Commonly, these junior obligations are rated below investment grade. The legislation would target the use of these obligations, when used in a hostile acquisition. A hostile acquisition would occur when a person or group acquires more than 20 percent of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock or at least 20 percent of the total value of all the classes of stock during a 12-month period, provided that such acquisition is not approved by the target company's board of directors. Obligation issued after February 18, 1985, would be affected by this provision.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation I am introducing today also contains a provision from my earlier bill, H.R. 1003, dealing with taxation of greenmail profits. The provision seeks to end the universally condemned practice of greenmail by imposing a nondeductible excise tax on greenmail profits earned by stock speculators and profiteers. The term "greenmail profits" means any gain realized by a 4-percent or more shareholder on the sale of exchange of any stock in a corporation if such shareholder held the stock for a period of less than 2 years, and if, at some time during the 2-year period there was a public tender offer for stock in the target corporation. A 50 percent nondeductible excise tax will be imposed on these greenmail profits unless, throughout the 1 year ending of the date of the sale or exchange, such person was an officer, director, or employee of the target corporation.

The 50-percent excise tax would not apply if the shareholder had been a 4-percent or more shareholder for the entire 1-year period ending on the date of the sale or exchange. A summary of my legislation follows below.

Mr. Speaker, I am vitally concerned about the serious escalation of corporate takeovers that has become a get-rich-quick scheme among Wall Street speculators. It is time that Congress consider how the Federal Government is underwriting these abusive financing plans. The legislation I have introduced today is a first step in addressing this most serious problem. It is my hope that appropriate committee consideration will begin at the earliest possible date.

EXPLANATION OF H.R. 1100—A BILL INTRODUCED BY MR. JONES OF OKLAHOMA

SEC. 1. EXCISE TAX ON GREENMAIL PROFIT

Under the bill, any 4-percent shareholder that realizes any gain that is a greenmail profit is subject to an excise tax equal to 50 percent of that profit.

The Greenmail profit is the gain realized by a 4-percent shareholder if the shareholder held the stock for a period of less than two years unless if during a 1-year period ending on the date of the sale the shareholder was an officer, director or employee or a 4-percent shareholder. Also, during that period that the shareholder held the stock there must be a public tender offer for the stock or that shareholder or some other shareholder owning at least 4 percent of the stock submitted a written proposal to a corporation which either suggests or sets forth a plan involving a public tender offer. For purposes of the bill, a public tender offer is any offer to purchase or acquire stock in the corporation if such offer is required to be filed or registered with a federal or state agency regulating securities.

A 4-percent shareholder is a shareholder that owns at least 4 percent of the total combined voting power of all stock entitled to vote in the corporation.

The excise tax is to apply to sales and exchanges made after February 6, 1985, with respect the the taxable year ending after that date. However, the excise tax is not to apply to any sale or exchange that is made pursuant to a written agreement in existence on February 5, 1985.

SEC. 2. INTEREST ON HOSTILE ACQUISITION INDEBTEDNESS

Under the bill, no deduction is to be allowed for any interest paid or incurred during the taxable year with respect to hostile acquisition indebtedness. Hostile acquisition indebtedness is any junior obligation issued after February 18, 1985, in connection with a hostile acquisition.

A hostile acquisition is any merger, consolidation or acquisition of property or stock, a separation, reorganization, distribution of property (whether or not in liquidation) of any similar transaction involving a corporation. A hostile acquisition must also involve any other person or group of persons acting in concert who acquire during the twelve month period preceeding the transaction, stock ownership representing at least 20 percent of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock entitled to vote or at least 20 percent of the total fair market value of the shares of all stock (other than nonvoting stock which is limited an preferred as the dividends). The provision only applies if the transaction before a consummation was not formally approved by a majority (consisting of at least two members) of the independent members of the board of directors of the corporation. No member of the board is to be treated as independent if that member is an officer or employee of the corporation or was nominated by a person or group of persons who acquired the requisite 20 percent interest.

A junior obligation is any obligation evidenced by a bond, debenture, note or other evidence of indebtedness which upon issuance satisfies any one of three conditions. The first condition is that it is expressly subordinated in the right of payment to the payment of any substantial amount of unsecured indebtedness, whether outstanding or subsequently issued, or the issuer or the corporation. The second condition is that it is indebtedness of a person over half the value of the gross assets of which is (or following the hostile acquisition would be) represented by the stock of the corporation, cash and cash equivalents. The third condition is that the indebtedness has a rating from a nationally recognized rating agency which is at least two ratings inferior to the rating from such agency in respect of any other substantial class of debt of the issuer or the corporation.

An extension renewal or refinancing of a preexisting obligation is not to be treated as the issuance of a new obligation for purposes of this bill. Also, an obligation which is a hostile acquisition indebtedness of the issuer is hostile acquisition indebtedness of any other person which become liable on such obligation as a guarantor, endorsor or indemnator or which assumes liability for such obligation in any transaction.

The amendments made by this section are to apply to interest paid or incurred after February 18, 1985, in taxable years ending after that date.

AFRICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, terrible human suffering is occurring in 20 nations of Africa as the result of drought and famine. As many as 150 million people are affected by the devastating conditions. Death from starvation is widespread in parts of Ethiopia, Sudan, Chad, Mali, and Mozambique. Severe hunger has also been reported in Mauritania, Burkina Faso, Niger, and Angola. The current crisis requires immediate and substantial action to avert further massive loss of lives. There is a universal outcry for the delivery of emergency food aid to these countries. However, food alone is not enough. Many nonfood items are equally critical.

Those Africans strong enough to reach the feeding centers are in urgent need of medical supplies, vaccines, blankets, shelter, water, cooking utensils, and cooking fuel. The relief agencies operating the camps need water well-drilling equipment, water purification and storage equipment; power generators; nutrition assessments; emergency air transport; food monitors; and, four wheel trucks and animals to transport and distribute the critical supplies.

But the feeding centers are only one part of the immediate crisis. Farms have been destroyed and deserted, seeds have been eaten, draft animals have died, wells have dried up, deserts are expanding and agricultural land is deteriorating as a result of the drought. If the response to the African famine is limited solely to a relief operation, the victims will be even less self-sufficient, more vulnerable to future droughts and the affected countries will be in continued and even greater need of emergency aid from the international community. The difficult work of rehabilitating the drought devastated areas must begin now. Africans urgently need to begin the process of growing food again. There is an immediate need for seeds, tools, and draft animals; wells need to be drilled, new water sources developed and protected; encroaching deserts must be stopped, sand dunes stabilized and new trees and shrubs planted to protect the soil; herds of cattle and oxen need to be restocked; and Africans, weakened and sickly from years of starvation and related disease, need to be brought back to strength and good health to be productive.

To meet these needs, the American private voluntary organizations, the major channels of U.S. Government emergency relief and recovery efforts in Africa, have requested more than $100 million to operate emergency programs. In addition, the United Nations Special Office for Emergency Operations in Africa, headed by former Congressman Bradford Morse, has identified needs requiring over $150 million in unmet nonfood emergency needs for the most seriously affected countries. A slow and inadequate response to these requests will literally mean death for tens, perhaps hundreds of thousands. Yet, the administration has asked Congress for only $25 million for additional nonfood disaster assistance.

I have joined with colleagues who are principal sponsors of legislation for emergency supplemental aid to Africa before the House of Representatives. We met throughout the February recess in an effort to reach agreement amongst ourselves on this pressing issue. Late last Friday, we reached consensus on fiscal year 1985 supplemental package totaling $701.5 million that, we believe, is responsive to the hunger pressures faced by some 150 million starving people in Africa. H.R. 1096 requests $175 million in emergency, nonfood assistance including $137.5 million in disaster assistance. It provides $2.5 million to ensure that the resources we provide actually reaches the starving of Africa. This legislation channels funds through private voluntary agencies and international organizations with the on-the-ground capability of initiating and carrying out life-saving and life-sustaining projects. It takes into consideration both the short- and medium-term problems and provides resources to meet them.

As you know, urgent attention to a supplemental is required if U.S. assistance to sub-Saharan Africa is not to be interrupted. Today's markup by the Foreign Affairs Committee and hearings before the Agriculture and Foreign Operations Appropriations Subcommittees indicate a clear sensitivity to the need for fast-track consideration. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 1096 as it would restore America's traditional image as a leader in humanitarian and governmental responsibility.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN HUMAN RIGHTS AND CONDITIONALITY ACT OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from the District of Columbia [Mr. FAUNTROY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, in these early days of the 99th Congress, Members of the House and Senate, Republicans and Democrats, have been working to develop a consensus around the question of legislation to deal with the system of apartheid in South Africa. Several legislative ideas have been put forward and the discussions are ongoing. It is hoped that within a very short time, a consensus will be reached, and the omnibus bill that we have all been awaiting and working for can be introduced with bipartisan support in the House and Senate.

At noon today, I shall introduce H.R. 1098, the South African Human Rights and Conditionality Act of 1985. I should point out that this bill may or may not be be embraced, in whole or in part, by the Free South Africa movement, of which I am a cochair. It is merely intended to be my contribution to the ongoing dialog. The bill contains two unique features:

First, while imposing certain immediate sanctions, it provides for stronger sanctions after 18 months if the Government of South Africa fails to meet specified conditions set out in the legislation. It further mandates complete divestiture by U.S. citizens or firms and expulsion of the South African Mission in the United States if the specified conditions are not met by South Africa within 3 years.

This graduated tightening of sanctions may be referred to as "conditionality" or the "Tutu principles." It grows out of respect for Bishop Desmond Tutu and his recommendation that the South African Government be given a time certain to make fundamental change or face stiff sanctions. The conditionality provisions are found at sections 201 and 202 of the bill.

Second, the second unique feature of the bill set out at section 206, is the provision of sanctions against foreign firms who do business in the United States, if after a U.S. firm has left South Africa, the foreign firm moves into the U.S. firm's former market.

This provision is vital to the legislation because, it seems to me that if a U.S. firm leaves voluntarily, as in the case of the Chrysler Corp., or even if a U.S. firm is forced to leave by operation of law, a foreign firm should not be able to step into that open market without fear of the loss of business here. U.S. divestiture could be frustrated if foreign firms merely substituted for them.

Apart from the two unique features in this legislation, there are other features which have been discussed or included in legislation over the years. Chapter 1, sections 101 through 106, lists immediate sanctions that are imposed against the Government of South Africa and against U.S. citizens or firms doing business with South Africa. Immediate sanctions are essential in order to send a clear message to the Government of South Africa that the American people are no longer willing to cooperate with this evil system of social segregation, political domination, and economic exploitation known as "apartheid." The message must go forward that we oppose apartheid not only because the system is morally, repugnant, but also because it has begun to undercut the job security of millions of Americans with its offer of a guaranteed source of cheap labor to the investors of the world. Steps must be taken now to root out that oppressive system. Consequently, six areas are targeted for immediate action:

First, new bank loans to the South African Government are prohibited.

Second, a prohibition is imposed on the importation of South African coins, including the krugerrand or any other gold or silver coin.

Third, the importation of coal and uranium from South Africa is prohibited.

Fourth, new investments by U.S. citizens in South Africa are prohibited.

Fifth, a prohibition is imposed on the export of nuclear items from the United States to South Africa.

Sixth, and a prohibition is imposed on the export of all goods and technology, including computer goods, from the United States to South Africa.

Also, at section 107 of chapter 1, is a provision designed to reduce the dependence by the United States on South African strategic materials, by mandating that the President undertake an aggressive research and development program to develop synthetic substitutes.

The sanctions imposed by this legislation may be terminated if the President certifies to Congress and if Congress adopts the certification by joint resolution that "substantial progress" toward the elimination of apartheid has occurred. "Substantial progress" under the legislation means:

First, implementing measures to assure that all persons in South Africa may participate in the political, economic, and social life of that country.

Second, establishing majority rule with protection for minority rights, based upon the principle of one person-one vote.

Third, providing a transition government or making major constitutional changes.

Fourth, freeing from incarceration and persecution all political prisoners and defined in the bill in accordance with the 1980 Refugee Act.

Fifth, implementing certain fair labor practices as defined in section 203 of the bill.

I am relatively confident that a bipartisan consensus will soon emerge in the 99th Congress and that legislation will pass directed at pressing for change in South Africa. I will continue to work with my colleagues in the Congress toward that goal. I do believe that the unique features of the bill I am introducing today, conditionality and no foreign substitution, are important measures that ought to be well considered.

Irrespective of the content of the final legislative draft, I am encouraged by the fact that more and more of my colleagues as a result of the demonstrations at the South African Embassy and the demonstrations in some 20 cities across the United States, are arriving at the view that America must do its part to halt the South African apartheid regimes' blind march to tragedy, bloodshed, and violence and to begin a serious attempt at national reconciliation and dialog with all of the people.

For just as it was inevitable that black codes would be repealed in this country, that slavery would be abolished, that Dred Scott would be vindicated, and that Jim Crow, with his fire hoses and dogs would be removed from our noble landscape, it is inevitable that that blot on the conscience of the world will be removed from South Africa. The only quesiton is, will the United States help remove it?

It is my hope that the introduction of the South African Human Rights and Conditionality Act of 1985, will contribute to the ongoing discussions and hasten the day when the American people, through its Congress and its President will exert its moral and economic influence on this question.

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous material on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to reserve this special order to commemorate the 67th anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day, and I thank all of my colleagues who are joining me today in tribute to the courageous Lithuanian people who continue to pray and to work for the day when their beloved country of Lithuania can once again join the community of free nations.

February 16, 1918, is a special day in man's historic struggle for freedom and self-determination for it was on this date 67 years ago that the Lithuanian people proclaimed their independence, and began to rebuild their country and reestablish democratic institutions, after the devastation of World War I.

The Lithuanian people are an industrious and proud people, and for almost one-quarter of a century, they began to enjoy the rewards of their own efforts and to appreciate the sense of security that comes from having the previous rights of self-determination and a democratic form of government.

Unfortunately, these benefits were shortlived. With the outbreak of World War II, Lithuania was savagely invaded by Stalin and his brutal Red Army. As soon as Lithuania had been occupied by military force, the Communists began arresting and executing Lithuanian patriots. Thousands of Lithuanians lost their lives or were forcibly moved in cattle cars to distant parts of the Communist empire, as the Soviets attempted to crush the culture, religion, and heritage of the Lithuanian people.

Nevertheless, Lithuanians have remained strong in their resolve to resist this Communist aggression, and our own country has never recognized the forced incorporation of Lithuania into the Soviet Union. The Supreme Committee for the Liberation of Lithuania at its convention on December 2, 1984, in Chicago, IL, adopted an appeal to express their strong commitment to the rights of Lithuanians to live in freedom, and to bear witness to the world of the numerous crimes and atrocities committed by the Communists against the Lithuanian people. A copy of this appeal follows:

The following appeal was adopted by the Supreme Committee for the Liberation of Lithuania at its convention on December 2, 1984, in Chicago, Illinois:

DEAR LITHUANIANS IN THE FATHERLAND, the Lithuanian nation resolved to be a sovereign democratic republic by issuing a Declaration of Independence on February 16, 1918. The will of the Lithuanian people was confirmed by the declarations of the Founding Diet on May 15, 1920. This will of the nation was further demonstrated by the armed struggle of 1918–1923, the nationwide uprising of June 22, 1941, the establishment of the Supreme Committee for the Liberation of Lithuania on November 25, 1943, the guerilla resistance against the sovietization of Lithuania during 1945–1952, and the unceasing activity of the patriotic underground.

Pope John Paul II has recognized the will of the Lithuanian nation in his address in Rome this year, commemorating the 500-year anniversary of the death of St. Casimir, patron saint of Lithuania, by urging Lithuanians to preserve their national traits and traditions.

Lithuania is the cradle of our existence. We yearn for it and we have the eternal right to live in it, despite the denial of this right by the Russian occupying power.

We, exiles, live in order to bear witness to the world, in the name of our shackled and silenced nation, of:

The resolve of the Lithuanian nation to restore and maintain its independent state;

The perfidy and the aggression of Russian bolshevism directed against peace in Europe and in the world;

The systematic cultural and physical genocide to which the Lithuanian people have been subjected;

The goals, the heroism and the harrowing experiences of the Lithuanian patriots.

We proclaim to the world the brutal crimes of the Soviet occupying power against the Lithuanian nation and state in violation of international law and specific treaties:

The occupation of Lithuania;

The denial of the right to self-determination; The colonial economic exploitation;

The colonization of Lithuania with settlers from other parts of the Soviet empire;

The systematic russification, from kindergarten to the university doctoral programs;

The ban on Lithuanian schools in Lithuanian communities outside of Lithuania's borders;

The illegal drafting of young Lithuanians into the Soviet military service;

The sending away of young Lithuanians to work in the distant reaches of the Soviet empire, as a condition for the completion of their education and the acquisition of professional experience;

The discrimination against native Lithuanians by the favored treatment of Russians in employment, housing, education and services;

The denial or restriction of the right to move about freely and to take up residence anywhere in one's native country;

The denial of the right to freely leave one's country and to return to it;

The denial of the freedoms of thought, conscience, convictions, exchange of views, assembly and the press;

The arbitrary interference into private lives, homes, correspondence and family relations;

The extreme restrictions imposed on links and communications with abroad, the sending and receiving of international mail as well as telephone and telegraph messages;

The discriminatory restrictions on the confession and practice of faith, as well as the teaching of religion;

The persecution and discrimination directed against religious believers who have been thus transformed into second-grade citizens;

The arbitrary arrests, deportations, and confiscation of property;

The inhuman and humiliating treatment of Lithuanian citizens by incarceration in concentration camps and special psychiatric hospitals;

The arbitrary transportation outside of Lithuania's borders of political prisoners or individuals who were forced into special psychiatric hospitals as a punishment for their views.

Our struggle in exile against the power that holds Lithuania occupied has been finding an increasingly wider response during recent years. This is attested by the statements of Western governments and parliamentarians, the resolutions adopted by Western parliaments emphasizing the illegality of Lithuania's enslavement, and the comments of the press. The conviction that the freedom of nations and individuals is an indispensable condition for the maintenance of permanant peace is now gaining currency all over the world.

As we strive to assist you, dear fellow Lithuanians, we also share your grave concern about the various ills that are part and parcel of the Soviet system:

Alcoholism and it ravages;

The spread of narcotics and their devastating mental and physical impact on future generations;

The deepening amorality, the decline of births, and the government-prompted murder of unborn infants for reasons other than health;

The mounting crime rate and the increase of violence.

We know that you are better aware of these ills and that you are doing everything possible to get rid of them.

It is not for us, who live abroad, to advise how Lithuanian patriots should behave under the Soviet Russian occupation. It is also not for us to judge who in the homeland works for the nation's well-being, and who, prompted by consideration of material gain, assists the occupying power in oppressing their compatriots. The last word about the latter will be said by our underground press and by surviving witnesses. Such quislings and members of the present-day "Black Hundreds" will be ultimately judged by the nation in the name of humanity.

We do share your concern about the young, hoping that they will withstand the spiritual and physical pressure of Russian chauvinism and totalitarian Marxism-Leninism. We trust that the ceaseless propaganda noise will not make them forget the noble humanitarian and patriotic ideals.

Lithuanians believe that their nation will survive and will preserve its unique culture until the end of time. Their most important task is to protect the physical and spiritual life of each member of their nation, in particular its greater treasure the children, and to raise them as healthy and enlightened patriots as well as members of the community of nations.

It is now almost forty-two years that we have been following this road in our effort to lighten your burden in the homeland and in your places of banishment.

On this solemn occasion, we salute the dauntless spirit of the Lithuanian people, and we assure the brave Lithuanians that our country continues to support their aspirations for freedom and independence. Once again, we express the fervent hope that one day Lithuanian people will achieve self-determination and determine the course of their own destiny in a freed homeland. I am glad to join with Lithuanian Americans residing in my own 11th Congressional District of Illinois which I am honored to represent, and Americans of Lithuanian descent in Chicago and all over this Nation, who are commemorating this anniversary.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I am delighted to yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS].

Mr. GAYDOS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for taking the time for this special order on such an important subject matter.

In the Pittsburgh area there are substantial numbers of Lithuanians and Lithuanians of Lithuanian descent and those in the corresponding areas of Latvia and the area in that part of Russia, adjacent to Russia, which in unison, all those individuals, have continuously, year after year, brought to the attention of their neighbors and colleagues in the Pittsburgh area, nationally throughout all 50 States, and yes, even the world, that they do have a cause, that they want their homeland to be free. They have contributed so much to this country through their customs, through their hard work and dedication. They number among some of the more dedicated Americans, those who have been nationalized.

I know my good friend from Chicago and that area knows whereof I speak when we talk about the Lithuanians and their influence on our customs, our activities, and the hard work that go to make up our industrial work areas in this country.

I want to conclude by again commending my very good personal friend with whom I work so closely in so many areas for taking the time on this most important subject matter to bring it to the attention of our colleagues and to have a vehicle with which our colleagues can join in this special order in letting their feelings be known formally as a matter of record.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I thank my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania for his outstanding contribution.

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, today the House commemorates Lithuanian Independence Day. I commend my colleague and friend FRANK ANNUNZIO for convening today's special order. Religious and political freedoms are under attack in Lithuania, as they have been continuously since the Soviets illegally occupied that brave nation almost half a century ago. We know also, however, that the will of the Lithuanian people to throw off the bonds that imprison them has not weakened, but instead has grown stronger.

The appeal and the dream of freedom is very much alive in Lithuania and her neighboring Baltic States of Latvia and Estonia. We in Congress have a sacred responsibility to support the noble cause of freedom in the oppressed Baltic States. Today's special order is a clear signal that the longstanding U.S. policy of not recognizing the Soviet claim to the Baltic States is very much an active interest in Congress, and deserves to be frequently reaffirmed.

Someday the people of Lithuania will realize their dream, and their freedom will be restored. They can be assured that we will not rest in our efforts on their behalf until they can take their rightful place in the community of free nations. Their cause is our cause, and we in Congress shall never be silent about the right of the Baltic peoples to live free from Soviet domination.●

● Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to join in this commemoration of Lithuanian Independence Day. February 16 marked the 67th anniversary of the commemoration of Lithuanian independence, and I believe that it is important that we continue to observe this occasion.

Mr. Speaker, as we know, Lithuania's time of independence ended in 1940 when the Soviet Union illegally invaded and occupied the nation. Yet while the people of Lithuania are subject to Soviet rule, their spirit of independence is still strong. The people of Lithuania would like nothing better than to live in freedom, and we here express every confidence that they, and the people of Latvia and Estonia, who are their Baltic neighbors, will one day achieve their dream.

This is a difficult time for free-thinking people in Lithuania. We understand that the Soviets are cracking down on the dissidents—the people who dare speak for freedom and human rights. Even the clergy has been subject to attacks by the Communist regime.

Mr. Speaker, we here in the West must continue to support the aspirations of the people of Lithuania, and we must continue to repudiate the attacks on human rights taking place daily in Lithuania, and throughout the Soviet Union. On this 67th anniversary, let us stand in solidarity with our Lithuanian friends, both in the free world and behind the Iron Curtain.●

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to join with my good friend FRANK ANNUNZIO for today's special order commemorating Lithuanian Independence Day.

As we all know, the Soviet Union continues to forcibly occupy the proud nation of Lithuania. What this means is that the people of Lithuania are not allowed to practice their religion or culture as they see fit. Instead, they are denied the most basic civil and human rights that we, as Americans, cherish so deeply.

Most admirable and encouraging is the fact that despite Soviet attempts to destroy the Lithuanian people—their spirit of freedom, lust for liberty, and sense of national pride remains strong. Such fervent desires and feelings express for us today the emotions and hopes of our Founding Fathers over 200 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, as a nation concerned with human rights, it should be our obligation to monitor the events and occurrences within Lithuania so as to exert pressure on the Soviet Union while revitalizing and supporting those who have the courage to dissent. And it should also be our goal to push for and promote the principles of freedom in those other countries like Lithuania where the desire for them is there—but government repression stands in their way.

The determination and perseverence and the suffering and sacrifice of the Lithuanian people have been great; let it not be in vain.●

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, today, we celebrate the 67th anniversary of the Declaration of Lithuanian Independence. It is vitally important that we pause and think about the significance of commemorating this day. The loss of any country to totalitarianism is a tragic experience and one which all free men should know and never forget. Only by remembering can we profit from the mistakes of the past and promise never to repeat them.

As all of you know, Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia were once free and independent nations. In 1922, the United States recognized those republics and welcomed them into the international arena. The Baltic Republics were viable nations made up of industrious and independent farmers who cherished their freedom.

In 1940, the Soviet Army marched into the Baltic States, and effectively sealed those small nations off from the prying eyes of western media. They immediately formed puppet regimes. The legislatures, completely dominated by members of the Communist party, petitioned the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. to incorporate each Baltic Republic into the Soviet Union.

As soon as the Russian troops arrived, and the incorporation was declared, the Soviets began a systematic campaign of violence against the population of these nations. The Soviets needed to wipe out the population of these nations. They also needed to totally eliminate any opposition to the new order. Over 665,000 Lithuanians, Estonians, and Latvians were deported to Siberia. The Kremlin settled large numbers of people of Russian stock in Lithuania and in other Baltic States to strengthen their control of the area. Widespread bloodshed ensued when the Baltic guerrillas took to the forest to establish a network of armed opposition to the illegal occupiers. More people were killed when the front changed and Nazi Germany invaded her old ally, the Soviet Union.

When the Soviets returned the second time in 1944, they were determined to stay and began a brutal plan of collectivizing the countryside. Farmers were forcibly evicted and deported. More troops than ever were brought in to destroy the guerrilla movement. Even so, the partisans continued their struggle until the early 1950's when, isolated by numerous divisions, many in the resistance movement gave up their arms.

In spite of overwhelming oppression, the peoples of the Baltic States are still struggling to maintain their linguistic, ethnic, and religious identities. We cannot abandon these freedom-loving peoples. The Lithuanians, and other ethnic groups along the eastern coast of the Baltic Sea, have already demonstrated their determination for liberty and their willingness to do what is necessary to keep their national characters intact.

We must continue to remind the world that there once were free and independent Baltic States, and should work together to bring about an end to the illegal occupation of Lithuania and other states in the region.

On this anniversary, I am certain that my colleagues in the Congress will join me in saying that those who forget history are doomed to repeat it.●

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleague, FRANK ANNUNZIO, in his special order commemorating the 67th anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day. I would also like to call attention to the 67th anniversary of the proclamation of independence by the Republic of Estonia on February 24. On both these days, we will remember the undying spirit of freedom exhibited by the Lithuanian and Estonian people as they declared themselves free and independent in 1918.

Together with the joyous remembrance of these glorious moments in Baltic history must also come the bitter memory of the subjugation of the Baltic people with the advent of the Russian Army in June 1940. Just as this short-lived freedom focused world attention on the spirit of the Baltic people, so their consequent subjugation must also focus our attention to the harsh reality of the repression and persecution of the Baltic people that continues to occur.

We must never forget the violations of human rights that the people of the Baltic States have experienced at the hands of the Soviets. The brutal Russification process in these areas has taken its toll on the population and on the traditions and heritage of the Baltic people. The Soviet conquerors have done all that is in their power to break the resistance of this proud ethnic group by attempting to replace the rich culture and languages of the Baltic States with the foreign Russian language and customs. To this day, Russian is taught as a second language to students in the Baltic elementary schools in an effort to replace the language of their native land and of their forefathers. The repression of human rights has also extended to limitations on religious freedom.

Today, as we remember the declarations of independence of Lithuania and Estonia, we must never forget the illegal incorporation of free and sovereign states by Soviet aggressors that followed. I ask my colleagues to continue to commemorate the spirit that gave birth to the declarations of independence of 1918 and to continue to support the Baltic people in their efforts to realize the dreams of their forefathers and once again breathe the air of freedom.●

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to join in this effort commemorating Lithuanian Independence Day. I also want to take this opportunity to commend the gentleman from Illinois, Congressman FRANK ANNUNZIO, for his initiative in arranging this special order.

February 16 is indeed an important date in world history. On that day 66 years ago the aspirations of the Lithuanian people were realized in the establishment of a democratic republic. For the next 22 years, this nation enjoyed the bounties of freedom and independence, a representative form of government and some security. Finally unshackled from authoritarian foreign rulers,the Lithuanian society and culture reached new heights.

Unfortunately, in 1940 this flowering democracy came to an abrupt and brutal end. After reaching a pact with Nazi Germany, Soviet troops invaded the Lithuanian capital and established a puppet Communist government. In August 1940, Lithuania was formally incorporated into the U.S.S.R.

However, the vitality and character of the Lithuanian people were not to be denied. The Nazi invasion of Russia provided an opportunity for the Lithuanian nation to rid itself of the Communist government and fight valiantly against the Nazi invaders. For 6 short weeks freedom and independence in Lithuania were restored. As history records this heroic people could not withstand the Nazi onslaught and subsequent Soviet hegemony. To this day, the hopes and dreams of the Lithuanian people remain brutally crushed by the heavy heal of Soviet tyranny.

Since a Communist government was installed in Lithuania in 1944, a strict and intensive policy of Sovietization has been pursued by the Kremlin rulers. The strong cultural heritage of the Lithuanian people remains suppressed. Religious and political expression is severely restricted and any unauthorized activity is dealt with harshly. Mental hospitals, labor camps, beatings, harassment, and other dastardly acts of inhumanity await those who dare to exercise their basic human rights.

Yet, courage, vision, and determination have enabled the Lithuanian people to preserve their cultural identity. Their intense desire for freedom remains as strong as ever and will, undoubtedly, be realized again.

As Chairman of the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations, I have a deep interest in the plight of the Lithuanian people. The subcommittee will continue to actively investigate Soviet abuses of these people. I am proud that our country has never recognized Soviet incorporation of Lithuania. We must continue to promote respect for human rights throughout the world and to help those who suffer under totalitarianism.●

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today is a joyous day for the friends of freedom as we celebrate the anniversary of Lithuanian independence. In February 1918, the Lithuanian people, who for centuries had suffered under Russian domination, fulfilled their age-old aspirations for national independence and freedom.

Sadly, Lithuanian independence was viciously suppressed in 1940, when Lithuania and her Baltic neighbors Estonia and Latvia fell victim to the Hitler-Stalin pact. Soviet troops marched into the three countries and imposed a cruel dictatorship that prevails to this very day. This generation of Lithuanians faces the biggest challenge in their country's history. The very survival of the nation is at stake as the Soviet Union implements a policy of Russification whose aim is to deny the Lithuanian people a language of their own, strip them of their cultural and national identity and, in effect, wipe them from the map of Europe.

In spite of the continuing repressions of the Kremlin and the KGB, the Lithuanian people are winning the battle of Russification. The chronicles of the Lithuanian Catholic Church continue to appear, relating the resistance efforts of the brave sons and daughters of Lithuania. Indominable individuals like Victoras Petkus, who has spent the better part of his life behind bars and barbed wire, offer inspiration to free people everywhere. He and others are defending their right to be what they are: Lithuanian. Millions of his countrymen share that spirit.

Those of us living in a free society can contribute to Lithuania's efforts to resist Russification and pave the way for a second declaration of independence. We must continue to speak out, as we are today, for the human rights of individual Lithuanians and the national rights of the whole country. Above all, we must stand firm with our policy of nonrecognition of the Soviet claim to Lithuania and the two other Baltic States. The people of Lithuania declared their national will 67 years ago when they declared their independence. Although their freedom was trampled under Soviet tanks and boots, their will to national independence remains firm. We must never give our direct or tacit approval to the false Soviet claims to Lithuania and the other captive nations. Instead, we must continue to affirm our support for the Lithuanian people in their struggle to win back their independence.

This tribute to Lithuania on the occasion of her Independence Day is our affirmation that the spirit of freedom is eternal. We have not forgotten the day in 1918 when the Lithuanian people spoke with one voice. We salute the heroes of Lithuania, both living and departed, and await with confidence that day when Lithuanian Independence Day will be celebrated in her beautiful capital city, Vilnius.●

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in rising today to join my colleagues in this well deserved salute to the brave Lithuanian people on the occasion of the 67th anniversary of their Independence Day.

Today, as we read of the continuing Russian stronghold on Afghanistan and Poland, we are reminded of the history of the Lithuanian nation.

February 16, 1918, is a day that will always be warmly embraced by Lithuanians and all freedom loving people around the world. For it was on that date that the Lithuanian nation became free of Soviet rule with a formal declaration of independence. That independence was widely recognized by many nations of the free world, including the United States. And, to the surprise of many, the Soviet Union signed a peace treaty with Lithuania, formally acknowledging its right to be a free and independent nation.

The proud people of the new nation soon established a strong economic base through the initiation of a series of wide-ranging, agricultural and industrial programs.

But the dream was short lived. The advent of World War II found Lithuania in the middle of the Russians and the German Army.

Despite strong protests on the part of the Lithuanians, the Russians forced their way onto Lithuanian soil and utilized the new nation as a base for its troops who were preparing attacks against the Germans.

In 1940, the birth of freedom in the fledgling nation of Lithuania was crushed by the savage Russian boot when the Soviets invaded the land. Soon after they set up a rigged election that culminated in Lithuania being illegally incorporated as a part of the Soviet Union.

During that sad period literally thousands of Lithuanians died at the hands of the brutual Russian occupation forces while others were illegally imprisoned or deported.

Despite the fact that the Russians occupied Lithuanian soil, they never conquered the minds of the Lithuanian people. The citizens of Lithuania, strong in their devotion to their religion, language, and traditions resisted attempts by the Russians to force them to accept their language and way of life. That resistance and devotion to their homeland still holds true for the Lithuanian people today.

As a member of the House Ad Hoc Committee on the Baltic States and the Ukraine, I ask all Members of this most august body to join with me in reaffirming the resolution sanctioned by the Lithuanian World Congress in 1958 that Lithuanians "have not accepted and will never accept slavery."●

● Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, on February 16, 1918, the independent Lithuanian nation declared its independence. This was a goal toward which it had been striving while under more than a century of Russian domination.

Once attained, it was a goal which paved the way for remarkable achievement.

For 22 years, Lithuania enjoyed a period of freedom and saw her economy, industry, culture, and national spirit flourish. However, in 1940, Soviet soldiers marched in, forced a coalition government to resign and installed a regime of their own choosing. Today, Lithuania is a colony in a vast Russian empire. Unfortunately, this ruthless takeover is consistent with the Soviet Union's longstanding policy of imperialism and intervention.

Although the leaders of the Soviet Union apparently believe that the world is not aware of their atrocities—Americans are all too aware that the Lithuanian people are being denied their basic, individual rights, that their cultural identity is being suppressed, and that the Communist state has systematically taken over the churches. We also know that those who have been brave enough to speak out over the years, such as Balys Gayauskas, Viktoras Petkus, Antanas Terleckas, Vytautas Skodzius and many, many others, faced harassment, imprisonment, or both.

The Lithuanian people continue to resist the Soviet domination, religious persecution, and cultural genocide being practiced against them. However, it is crucial that we remain vigilant in reaffirming our commitment to press the Soviet Union to implement the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights and the Helsinki accord.

Just as the Soviet leadership has never accepted the right of other nations to chart their own destiny or reject the Soviet totalitarian model—the Lithuanians have never accepted the Soviet oppression and continue their efforts to reclaim control over their own lives. Further, the United States, as the undeniable leader of the free world, has never recognized the Soviet Union's annexation of Lithuania or any of the Baltic States.

Soviet repression in Afghanistan and Poland brings fresh evidence of the moral bankruptcy of the Soviet system. Hopefully, our words today, and the firm American resolve to support the liberty and sovereignty of other nations, will offer encouragement to the Lithuanian people. The strong, unfailing spirit of the Lithuanian people survived Soviet domination and it is important that they know that they are being seen and heard by a nation which remembers and cares.

The United States must continue to support the aspirations of freedom, independence, and national self-determination of the people of Lithuania and others held captive. Until that day, we salute the brave Lithuanian people for reminding us, through their struggle, of how precious and valuable freedom is and how costly its loss.●

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in commemorating February 19, 1985, as Lithuanian Independence Day. Sixty-seven years ago, the courageous Lithuanian people asserted their right to self-determination and declared Lithuania a united and independent republic.

Sadly, in June of 1940, under the Nazi-Soviet alliance of Hitler and Stalin, the Soviet Union demanded a Soviet-installed government in Lithuania and held a single-party election. One month later, the Soviet Union annexed this heroic but vulnerable nation, occupied by German troops until the end of World War II, and then reoccupied by Soviet forces. The United States has never recognized the unlawful occupation of Lithuania and her neighbors, and continues to maintain diplomatic relations with the representatives of the independent Republic of Lithuania.

Uncounted thousands of brave Lithuanians have been killed or imprisoned by the Soviet Union for their struggles to save the rich culture and heritage, the religious freedom, and the political independence of their homeland from foreign oppression. Hundreds of thousands more have been forced to flee their native land because of their unshakable belief in a free Lithuania and the rights of her people.

Lithuanians throughout the world continue to struggle for a new Lithuanian independence and for the reestablishment of the basic human rights of the Lithuanian people. I am honored to join with Lithuanians everywhere in their quest for freedom and in the celebration of Lithuanian Independence Day.●

● Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to join with my colleagues today in commemorating the 67th anniversary of the declaration of Lithuanian independence which took place on February 16, 1918. We in the United States are privileged to have a government of our own choosing and design. However, we must never forget that there are people in the world today who are denied such a basic human right.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Lithuania have a history of sovereignty that can be traced back to the 11th century. Yet, for the past 67 years, the sovereignty of the Lithuanian people has been denied. On June 15, 1940, the Soviet Union occupied Lithuania, and after Soviet-controlled elections were held, Lithuania was forcibly incorporated into the Soviet Union.

Since that time, the Lithuanian people have been subjected to a campaign of repression by the Kremlin. Their religious and cultural leaders have been arrested, exiled to Siberia, and even murdered. Most of the Lithuanians are Roman Catholics who have been denied their religious freedom. The Catholic Church of Lithuania has been the target of harassment. The Soviet leaders have closed churches and seminaries and continue to persecute those who attempt to remain active in the church and pass along its teachings to their children. Each of these actions is in violation of the Helsinki accords, which the Soviet Union signed. The members of the Lithuanian Helsinki group, established in 1976 to monitor Soviet compliance with the Helsinki accords, were effectively eliminated by the Soviet authorities.

The United States has never recognized the Soviet state operating in Lithuania. Today, we specially mark the plight of the Lithuanian people, but we must remember them every day, and never relax our efforts until their freedom is restored. The Lithuanian people and their families here, in America, have my support and my prayers that one day Lithuania will again be a free and sovereign nation.●

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr Speaker, I rise this afternoon to join my colleagues in commemorating the 67th anniversary of Lithuanian independence. On February 16, 1918, the Lithuanian people established a democratic government, committed to the ideals of freedom, individual rights and social justice. While the people of Lithuania and the other Baltic States have lived under the yoke of Soviet domination for the last 45 years, it is altogether proper for the House to take time to remember the promise of Lithuanian independence.

As a member of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Human Rights, I am cognizant of the extent of worldwide violations of human rights. In the Soviet Union, South Africa, the Far East, and Latin America, too often we see individuals denied the right to live, work, and worship in a manner consistent with their desires. In Lithuania, the denial is all the more painful because of the freedom which once flourished there. The courageous people of Lithuania, who enjoyed the benefits of liberty for over two decades, continue to keep the flame of freedom burning, and their plea for independence continues to be heard by all those who care deeply about human rights around the world.

February 16, 1918, brought an end to over 100 years of foreign domination for the people of Lithuania. For the next quarter century, they founded free institutions and proudly kindled their rich cultural religious, and literary heritage. Their brief, shining moment was brought to an end with the World War II invasion by the Soviet Army. Even with massive deportations, arrests, and attempts to destroy Lithuania's language, culture, and religious values, the Soviets have failed to destroy their captor's desire for freedom. Today we honor the people of Lithuania who continue to struggle and refuse to submit. Their determination to endure will surely succeed. No people can be subjugated for eternity, even by such masters of oppression, the Soviets.

Here in America this week we celebrate our legacy of freedom by remembering two of our greatest leaders, Presidents Washington and Lincoln. Their love of liberty and their willingness to devote their greatest efforts for its endurance have brought to us the fullest freedom enjoyed by any people since the beginning of time. Now, in our time, America has a responsibility to continue to serve the cause of human rights and freedom, not only in our own country, but everywhere where the rights of men and women are ignored or abused. Today, we stand not only with the people of Lithuania and the Baltic States, but with all our brothers and sisters across the globe who are persecuted for the beliefs and their thirst for freedom.

On Washington's birthday in 1861, President Lincoln spoke to an assemblage at Independence Hall in Philadelphia. He paid brief and eloquent tribute to the brave Americans who wrote, and fought for and died for, the Declaration of Independence. As we commemorate the brief independence of Lithuania, Lincoln's words still command attention. Our Declaration, he asserted, was a promise not only of liberty and freedom "to the people of this country, but of hope to the world * * * hope that in due time the weights should be lifted from the shoulders of all men, and that all should have an equal chance." Let us continue to extend the promise of hope, to the people of Lithuania and to the people of the world.●

● Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today we are here to honor the proud and resolute people of Lithuania who have never given up their struggle for freedom. In past years, I have spoken to commemorate Lithuanian Independence Day. The Lithuanians are one people who truly deserve to be honored. They refuse to abandon their dream of one day reestablishing Lithuania as an independent country.

The nation of Lithuania obtained its independence 67 years ago. Yet, just over 22 years later, the courageous people of this great country were overrun by the forces of the Soviet Union. Today, it is still the Russians who administer the nation's economy. They are the ones who wrongfully enjoy the fruits of the labor of this determined, hard-working people. The sovietization of Lithuania's economy and the nationalization of its industry have robbed Lithuanians of their rightful heritage and place in history.

February 16 is the anniversary of the Lithuanian Declaration of Independence. This date is significant in that it comes so very close to the birthdays of two of our greatest Presidents, Lincoln and Washington. It serves as a constant reminder to us of the struggles going on today for democracy, freedom of speech and human rights. We, in this country, must remember that freedom is a birthright that cannot be taken for granted.

Lithuanians in this country have demonstrated their willingness to work hard as is evidenced by their positive contributions to our society. These contributions are truly inspirational. They encourage us to continue to support the Lithuanians in keeping their hopes alive.

The Lithuanian's dream of freedom must be sustained. I am confident that someday in the future this dream will be realized.●

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to join my distinguished colleague, FRANK ANNUNZIO, in this special tribute commemorating the 67th anniversary of the reestablishment of the independent State of Lithuania.

It was on the 16th of February, in the year 1918, that the Lithuanian people declared their full independence from over 100 years of Russian and German domination. For two decades Lithuanians were able to exercise their basic human rights. During this brief period of independence, the Lithuanian people proved themselves truly capable of achieving tremendous social and economic strides. Unfortunately, this taste of freedom did not last long. In 1940, the Soviet Union, in total disregard for the rights of a free nation, began its occupation of the once sovereign nation of Lithuania. Since the Soviet Union's illegal annexation of the State of Lithuanian, this fiercely independent country has fought against domination.

This commemoration of Lithuanian Independence Day remains an important symbol for Americans and the world. We must never forget the plight of Lithuania. I am happy to join my colleagues in reaffirming our moral commitment to Lithuania's struggle for liberty.●

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in commemorating Lithuanian Independence Day, and I am grateful to my colleague, Mr. ANNUNZIO, for taking out this special order. We mark this anniversary with a sense of irony, for the brutal truth is that Lithuania is far from independent; she is the victim of Soviet imperialism. The tragic reality is that the Baltic nations which in the aftermath of the First World War realized their dream of self-determination, saw this dream crushed in the aftermath of the Second World War. The Soviet Union, through the naked use of its overwhelming military power, has annexed these tiny nations and sought to destroy the independent identity of these proud peoples. The Soviet oppression of Lithuania, which is an everyday reality for those who live under it, as well as for their brethren in the free world who hold out the hand of solidarity to them, is one of the many blemishes which stain the Soviet Union's record. We commemorate Lithuanian Independence Day to remind the people of Lithuania, as well as ourselves, that we have not forgotten them.●

● Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, today we are commemorating the anniversary of the Declaration of Lithuanian Independence. Sixty-seven years ago the Lithuanian people exercised their right of self-determination by declaring their independence from Russia and Germany and setting up a democracy. During this period, Lithuanian culture flourished and the country began to rebuild the damage of World War I. This era ended abruptly when the Soviet Union occupied Lithuania in 1940 and set up a puppet government.

Since then, the Soviet Union has engaged in a systematic campaign aimed at eliminating the Lithuanian language and culture as well as stamping out all political dissent. Thousands of Lithuanians have been killed because of their political beliefs, and many more have had their basic human rights violated. The government and schools require the use of the Russian language, a foreign tongue to Lithuanians. The religious traditions which have historically been an important part of the Lithuanians' lives are denigrated and those who practice religion are persecuted.

In spite of this oppression, the Lithuanian people at home and abroad continue the fight to preserve their culture and regain their independence. They are modern day patriots, continuing the fight for Lithuanian independence begun in the 19th century.●

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, on February 16 we will commemorate the 67th anniversary of the restoration of an independent Lithuanian State and the 734th anniversary of the founding of that State. I would like to take this opportunity to voice my concern for the people of Lithuania who have been oppressed for almost half a century.

We Members of Congress have the distinct honor of speaking for over a million American citizens of Lithuanian heritage. My greatest hope is that our voices will be heard by the Lithuanian people who are the subject of this Soviet repression. The aspirations of these people are synonymous with our own. They strive for the equal rights and the self-determination which were set forth in principle VIII of the Helsinki Final Act. Let them be assured that we will continue to strengthen efforts to award them the very principles which we have embraced as realities in our own lifetimes.

The Republic of Lithuania has enjoyed only a brief 22 years of independence. Despite its peace treaty and nonaggression pact with the Soviet Union, Lithuania was forcibly incorporated into the Soviet bloc in 1940. We as the U.S. Government, have refused to recognize that incorporation and continue to maintain diplomatic relations with the former free governments of the Baltic States.

The Lithuanian people's struggle for independence continues to be a prime concern of our Government. On February 16, when we honor these people who are fighting to express their religious and cultural freedoms, we will rededicate ourselves to the promotion of these fundamental freedoms, in Lithuania, in the Baltic States, and in the oppressed nations all over the world.●

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in today's special order marking the 67th anniversary of Lithuanian independence.

It was on February 16, 1918, that the people of Lithuania formally established a free and independent democratic republic of Lithuania. During the next 20 years, Lithuanian agriculture, industry and the arts all flourished. A constitution was adopted protecting the cherished freedoms of speech, assembly, and religion.

But the bright future for this fledgling Baltic State was painfully cut short when, in 1940, it was illegally and forcibly annexed into the Soviet Union.

Despite the subsequent 45 years of brutal Soviet domination, the proud and brave people of Lithuania have never given up hope that one day they will again be free.

Neither has the United States ever given up hope. We have never, nor will we ever recognize Soviet claim to this land.

We therefore mark this date to remember the proclamation of Lithuanian independence in 1918, as well as to keep the attention of all the world focused on the political injustice, religious persecution, economic and cultural deprivation the people of Lithuania have suffered at the hands of Soviet oppressors.●

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join with my colleagues in this observance of Lithuanian independence Day.

The fate of the Lithuanian nation is a painful reminder that we must be ever vigilant in the defense of freedom. The sufferings and courage of the Lithuanian people is indeed a tribute to mankind's tenacity in the continuing battle for justice and human rights. Despite years of the most brutal Soviet oppression and subjugation, the Lithuanian people have remained steadfast in their commitment to national self determination and individual rights.

On this solemn occasion, let us join with raised voices across the land calling for the liberty of all mankind, and let us give strength to the undying aspirations of the Lithuanian people for freedom and liberty.●

THE FARM CREDIT CRISIS SITUATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COLEMAN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am taking 60 minutes today of the House in a special order. I am going to be joined by several of my colleagues to highlight and to identify some of the farm credit crisis issues that are facing this Nation.

I do not think it is a statement beyond the facts that there is a farm credit crisis and if that it is not addressed in the next 30 to perhaps 45 days, we could see up to 20 percent of Missouri farmers go out of business or up to 8 to 15 percent of all farmers, nationwide, go out of business this spring.

Certainly the agricultural economy in general is not enjoying the recovery that much of the Nation is coming under. In fact, farmers are faced with high interest rates, declining land values, and low returns on their products to the extent that they are reliving the Great Depression of the 1930's.

Before I risk losing the attention of some of my urban colleagues, let me point out that agriculture and agribusiness represent millions of jobs in this country and industries that are related, in service industries and transportation to agriculture.

Fully 22 percent of our Nation's work force, or 22.7 million individuals, work in agricultural-related industries.

Their future, as well as that of 3 million American farmers, is indeed at stake.

The depressed agricultural economy has obviously caused a great deal of stress on a number of institutions, not the least of which have been agricultural banks and other agricultural lenders. As a result, Mr. Speaker, many banks are not in a position to make new spring agricultural loans for seed and feed this spring.

Last year 79 commercial banks were liquidated nationwide. Of the 43 liquidated in the first half of 1984, only seven were considered agricultural-related banks. However, in the second half of the last year, 23 out of the 36 liquidated banks were agricultural oriented institutions.

Information from the farm credit system itself indicates the degree to which this problem exists. The farm credit system, Mr. Speaker, is the system which we have within the quasi-governmental area. Many of these are made up of farmers themselves who have pooled their resources and have come together under production credit agencies, and they loan money to themselves through various boards and various institutions. In talking with these people in St. Louis last week, in the State of Missouri alone there are almost $380 million worth of PCA loan moneys out there, and a full 3.5 percent are delinquent. This is three and four times more than the usual. And the number of loans lost this last year, as well as the number of loans in the process of liquidation, amount to over $28 million just in the State of Missouri.

We also have the Federal Land Bank which makes most of the loans for farmers who want to purchase their land. In the State of Missouri we have almost $1.3 billion loaned out by the Federal Land Banks. Up to $21 million of this is in the form of foreclosure or losses in 1984.

The Farmers Home Administration is a branch of the USDA, and it is the lender of last resort. That means that farmers who cannot get credit elsewhere are going to the Farmers Home Administration to secure available loans through that resource. Unfortunately, a number of these people have been unable to pay back their loans in the past, and the Farmers Home Administration has taken over the family farm either in the past through foreclosure, but more recently just by the farmer deeding it back simply because he cannot make the cash flow payments and he cannot produce enough off of that land to pay back the Government.

In the State of Missouri alone, we have some 75,000 acres now owned by Uncle Sam, representing over 300 farms, of people who simply were unable to pay back their loans on time and, as a result, tendered back the deed to the Federal Government.

This shows you the degree to which the farm credit crisis is actually being hit and felt by the lenders, the Government lenders as well as the commercial lenders in this country.

Obviously, in this climate the banks are very reluctant to lend more money to farmers. An informal survey made in the Federal Reserve district coming out of Kansas City, which represents some six States, including Missouri and Kansas, shows that up to 15 percent of the farmers in that region will not be able to borrow money to get the loans needed to plant their crops in the next 30 days. The impact of this depressed economy extends throughout the rural areas. While the Midwest is the first to feel the impact, the domino effect will be felt throughout the Nation.

Farmers cannot pay their bills to the seed and fertilizer dealers, and the seed and fertilizer dealers cannot pay their loans at the bank. This chain continues until we find jobs being eliminated in our urban areas and throughout this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I have a few charts here that I would like to point out. The first one is the importance to the State of Missouri of agribusiness and agriculture from the growth State product. It is the accumulation of all goods and services produced in my State in 1984. We can see by this chart that agribusiness is second only to the total manufacturing, representing some $17 billion of product last year in our State, more than almost twice as much of all of the financial insurance and real estate transactions that added up in the State of Missouri last year. That shows a significant impact on a statewide basis. Missouri is a fairly heavily industrialized State in Kansas City and St. Louis.

The next chart shows the Kansas City metropolitan region, the industrial output again, agribusiness being No. 1 of all classifications in 1984, with over $5 billion contributing to Kansas City's well-being through agribusiness. We can see that manufacturing and other services are lower, as well as government, retail, and wholesale coming down the chart in 1982.

In the city of St. Louis and the county of St. Louis we have more than the national average of people who seek their employment through the agribusiness community. A full 23.4 percent, or over 238,000 workers in the St. Louis area, for example, receive their livelihood through agribusiness or agriculture, and, nationally, as I said earlier, a full 22 percent of the Nation.

Farmers are not asking for a bailout. Many were advised by the Government back in the 1970's to expand, when credit was easily obtained and the export picture looked very promising. Our farmers were told that they could produce enough to feed the entire world, and they went out and did that. We see the total land use for crops expanded by 54 million acres from 1969 through 1981. Now many farmers are left holding the bag.

Mr. Speaker, I was touched by a recent letter that I received from a constituent. I would like to share it with you this afternoon. She writes:

> I write you asking, pleading in panic and despair. There must be a way to keep our friends, our neighbors, and family from disappearing into the unknown places. How will we feed the future starving Ethiopians, or whoever, if thousands of farmers themselves are on food stamps or free commodities. I don't mind biting the bullet in periods of hard times, but I sure hate to think that we might be forced to eat those bullets because there is nothing else to eat. While millions and billions of our tax money is sent out of the country to assist those in need, we are left to starve, lose everything we have worked so hard and long for. And, to me, that's a betrayal of your own and a going over to what often becomes an enemy.

She writes:

> Sincerely, a farm wife sitting in the midst of what is fast becoming the desolate area of abandoned farms.

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I think this is an accurate reflection of what is happening in rural America. A survey was recently conducted by the University of Missouri to find out just how serious the farm credit crisis really is. Of farm operators surveyed who are under 40 years of age, almost 13 percent anticipated that they would not be in farming next year. It was also estimated that at least 20 percent of today's farmers will lose their land over the next 3 years.

Now, Missouri has 112,000 farms, and what will happen if almost 22,400 of these farms fall during the next 3 years?

We know that the farm family is traditionally a very close-knit unit. As farmers face foreclosure or bankruptcy, his entire family suffers. Reports of domestic violence associated with stress are certainly on the rise. We have received reports that some Farmers Home Administration county officials have been threatened and feel it is necessary to arm themselves. A sociologist at the University of Missouri found suicide rates among those in agriculture 30 to 40 percent above the nonfarm rate.

Our farmers need assistance immediately to help make this transition period for agriculture less painful. They need to know whether or not they are going to have the ability to borrow money this spring in order to get their money to buy their seed and their fertilizer and their herbicides and their pesticides, to have confidence that they will be able to make enough income in fact to be able to put food on their own tables.

So, Mr. Speaker, let me outline briefly some of the solutions to this problem. First of all, I welcome the President's initiatives, back in September, when he recognized that the farm credit crunch was in fact coming on very strongly. At that point in time he stated his policy to be and has been the policy that the Federal Government would guarantee certain loans made through the private lending institutions if those private lending institutions would reduce down the principal by 10 percent in exchange for 90-percent Government guarantee. The President also addressed those people who I said earlier received Farmers Home Administration loans, and those people who can show a positive cashflow can put up to one-fourth of those loans on the shelf up to 5 years with no interest running to be able to get them over this very difficult time.

The President just a week and a half ago amended his proposal in order to allow banks and commercial lenders to reduce down not just principal but also interest rates to farmers in order for more lenders to participate and therefore to help more farmers. I welcome the President's response. But unfortunately we are talking about past debt. The immediate crisis is on us now. Farmers need to know, the 20 percent in the State of Missouri, if and where they can receive their loans this spring, and that is what I am addressing in legislation which I offered last year and introduced here in the House.

Basically, it does three things: First of all, it provides a 75-percent Federal loan guarantee through commercial lenders for operating loans this spring. The positive feature about this is that we do not have to set up any rules and regulations; we do not have to go through the Farmers Home Administration offices that are overburdened in the first place. Also, the moneys could be sent out immediately under the loan guarantee authority as soon as the President signs the legislation.

If we do not do something within the next 30 days it is going to be a moot point, so we have to expedite whatever we do on a very fast track. The second thing my bill does is to provide some relief to those farmers who have experienced natural disasters in 3 out of the last 5 years. Believe it or not, there are people in our area who have sustained more than 3 out of 5 years. Those people who qualify in showing that they have sustained those significant losses, would be allowed to receive a 3-percent subsidized loan writedown by the Federal Government through the Farmers Home Administration. In other words, today the usual rate is 10.25 percent for operating loans; we would bring it down to 7.25 percent.

Finally, we are asking and we are addressing through legislation that the Farmers Home Administration have the personnel in place to assist farmers and to see whether or not they qualify under the President's initiative, and to see if they qualify under the Disaster Program and the loans that we see are piling up in all the county offices throughout this Nation.

The latest figures from the State of Missouri show that over 90 percent of the applications for disaster loans are still pending. Farmers do not know if they are going to be approved or disapproved. We have over 5,000 applications for people who want to be considered under the President's initiative that have simply piled up on the desks of hard-working local officials who simply cannot turn out enough of the approvals or even disapprovals in time for farmers to know where they stand this spring.

I indeed welcome the assistance that the administration came forward with last week in sending out 1,000 or more part-time employees to the various county offices of Farmers Home to expedite these loan application procedures.

Mr. Speaker, I am joined in this special order today by a number of distinguished Members who represent rural areas in this region, and I look forward to their contribution. I hope that I have set the tone and set the scene for those people who are not that familiar with the crisis facing rural America.

I yield to the gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH].

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I first want to thank the gentleman very much for holding this special order and to associate myself with his very cogent remarks. "Evidence is mounting that fear and despair are spreading among hundreds of thousands of farmers who are looking at losses of millions of acres—farms either already lost or likely to fall into the hands of creditors soon." These words from the New York Times on February 10, point to the growing awareness of a problem that has been developing for a decade and which has now reached the crisis level in rural areas throughout the country.

Farm debt in the United States now exceeds $200 billion. New figures from a joint study by the Food and Agricultural Policy Research Institute and the Farm Journal indicate that one-third of all farmers in the United States have debt to asset ratios greater than 40 percent. In Nebraska the percentage is even higher.

Most startling of all is that in the Central United States the average farmer under 35 years old is leveraged at 63 percent. The figure is nearly the same—61 percent—for the 35-44 age group. What this means in human terms is that the average farmer less than 45 years old in the heart of America is headed for insolvency, economic ruin and probable foreclosure.

Many of my farm State colleagues and I have been warning of an impending disaster in the agricultural sector for nearly a year, but never have we seen such ominous statistics as these. The situation has deteriorated rapidly and if left unchecked will continue to escalate.

The hardest hit States have been primarily in the Midwest, such as my home State of Nebraska. According to the Economic Research Service, Nebraska farmers and ranchers are more heavily leveraged than those in any other State. The credit crisis that first became apparent in Nebraska, Iowa, your home State of Missouri, Congressman COLEMAN, has now spread across the country. The average farmer under 35 in the Eastern United States has a debt to asset ratio of 54 percent—a level considered by many agricultual economists as nonsurvivable.

Export embargoes, unstable fiscal and monetary policies, and an overvalued dollar have dealt repeated and brutal blows to agriculture. The strong dollar has been particularly burdensome, especially considering, for example, that nearly two of each three bushels of wheat produced by American farmers must find an overseas market.

At risk is not only the traditional family—even in its modern and more efficient form—but the economic health of entire States, regions and ultimately the country. Although farmers are relatively few in number, 22 million workers in the United States are employed directly or indirectly by the food sector. Farm assets are equal to about 70 percent of the capital assets of all manufacturing corporations in the United States.

The huge nationwide Farm Credit System will lose an estimated $364 million this year—the most losses ever. Farm Credit Administrator Governor Wilkensen describes the situation as critical in the $80 billion farm credit system and reports that the private-sector Farm Credit System has over $2 billion of nonperforming assets. In some areas, such as the four-State Omaha Farm Credit District, the delinquency rate on Production Credit Association loans is as high as 20 to 25 percent.

The American Bankers Association, the Independent Bankers Assocation, and the Farm Credit Administration have joined with farm and ranch groups of all philosophies in calling for immediate Federal action to deal with the situation.

As Agriculture Secretary Block stated on February 12 to the U.S. News and World Report, "There's no way a farmer can make money paying 15 percent interest." Unfortunately, the administration's budget proposals will not lower the deficit or interest rates fast enough to prevent an economic disaster in the farm sector. The average interest rate on production loans in the Midwest is around 14 percent, with many paying even higher rates to compensate for bank losses on their neighbor's loans.

"The time for effective action is slipping away," according to Independent Bankers Association President Jack King. Farm banks make up 30 percent of all U.S. banks and many are facing the fate of their customers. Once again this points to the fact that the farm problem is a national problem and one that cannot be ignored.

The American Bankers Association, in their midyear survey, found that 61 percent of commercial bank's farm borrowers have debt to asset ratios greater than 40 percent. Mind you, 61 percent have debt to asset ratios rated at 40 percent. Of these borrowers, half have debt to asset ratios greater than 60 percent. Credit conditions have deteriorated significantly since this survey was taken. The American Bankers Association Agricultural Credit Survey finds that most banks expect a further deterioration of their farm borrowers net earnings and their farm-loan portfolio in 1985.

Of the 10 production credit associations in Nebraska, two have failed and are undergoing liquidation. No PCA in the State had ever failed prior to this year.

Recent production credit association losses exceeded all the losses in their 50-year history. The Farm Credit System is experiencing severe losses again this year, and the entire mutibillion dollar system will be endangered should land values continue their current slide.

The statistics tell a sad story. Loan foreclosures on Federal Land Bank of Omaha loans went from 195 in all of 1983, to 618 in 1984 through October. PCA foreclosures went from 76 to 141 in the same period.

Loan delinquencies on Federal Land Bank of Omaha loans climbed from 1,638 in 1983 to 2,137 in the first 10 months of 1984. Federal Intermediate Credit Bank of Omaha [PCA] deliquencies jumped from 1,457 in 1983 to 3,176 through October 1984.

Reports come in to my office daily concerning the shortage of staff at FmHA county offices and the lengthy delays in loan applications. Right now efforts are being made both administratively and legislatively to improve this situation. Thousands of farmers and ranchers are finding commercial lenders unwilling to continue their line of credit. The Farmers Home Administration, designated as the "lender of last resort," is intended to aid these people, but has been unable to do so because of a shortage of staff, loan funds, and guarantee authority.

Numerous proposals to deal with the farm crisis are now before both the House and Senate, and with time running out rapidly before spring planting we must move forward to stabilize the situation as quickly as possible. These next few days and weeks are a critical time as many loan payments come due on March 1. The spector of more farm auctions haunts the countryside and the prospect of unplanted fields is very real. I will be working in the Appropriations Committee for meaningful action on this issue and urge my colleagues to push forward with all due speed to address this urgent problem.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I thank the gentlewoman for her contribution. Of course, she knows that we look to her for her leadership on the Committee on Appropriations, because we can authorize all sorts of things around here, but unless she gets the money, then some of these well placed programs are not going to be any good. So we always look to her for that sort of guidance.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. I will be there, TOM. You can count on it.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I thank the gentlewoman for her contribution.

Mr. Speaker, let me just say two things about some of the things that she mentioned.

One was the fact that the strong dollar has made us almost noncompetitive overseas. That is absolutely true. Last year soybeans were selling on the cash market in Chicago for $6.22. Because of the value of the dollar being what it was overseas, if you were in England and tried to buy that $6.22 bushel of beans, it would have cost you over $8; if you were in France buying that same bushel of beans it was $6.80-some, and if you were in Mexico City interested in buying Missouri soybeans, you had to pay $49, the equivalent in Mexican pesos, for that bushel of beans. I have not checked the figures, but I do not think we sold too many bushels of beans at $49 to the Mexican Government this last year at that rate.

That is how the value of the dollar has impacted negatively on the farm community.

The other thing that I think is so important that the gentlewoman mentioned is the unfortunate lack of planning by the personnel out in our Farmers Home offices throughout this Nation. I make a comparable comparison to the tax season. Everybody knows that H&R Block, if they are going to have people come into their offices between January and April when taxes are filed, every year they have people trained, prepared, ready and they are there, and then they go to their normal business, or as housewives, or whatever. They are not there all year around.

I do not know why the Farmers Home Administration could not have done that too: Have their people trained, ready to go, and in place. It should be no secret that farmers borrow in the spring and they should have anticipated, with the number of counties declared disaster areas in your State and mine, that our farmers would be walking through those front doors asking for an application for disaster assistance and wanting to know whether or not they are going to be approved, and certainly after the President came forward in September, offering his proposal and policy, that they would have anticipated the over 6,000 people who applied in the State of Missouri, and I am sure comparable numbers throughout the Midwest, that this program is going to be utilized and looked at by farmers. Yet the people have not been there, as you say, and we need to get these people out there as soon as possible and with all due speed.

So I am critical not of the people who are working back in our county offices. I think they are doing a tremendous job, they are working overtime and they are really getting burned out. I really felt the people here in Washington should have planned the personnel along the line in a much better fashion.

I thank the gentlewoman for her contribution.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ROBERTS] who represents the big First District in Kansas, a No. 1 producing district in the entire State of Kansas, but also probably in the entire United States.

Mr. ROBERTS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Missouri for calling this special order on the farm credit crisis. I want to thank him for his leadership in this regard, and I also want to thank the gentlewoman from Nebraska, who is a good friend and colleague.

Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks we have seen numerous editorials, more especially in the big city press, and policy statements by our Budget Director, David Stockman, saying that the budget deficit is so severe and that farmers, because of greed or stupidity, made their own credit bed, and they go on to say that it is not the role of the Federal Government to bail out bad management and reward those folks who did not practice sound debt management.

To those folks, I reply that many of the current problems in agriculture have been prompted by that same Federal Government. It was stated Government policy just 10 years ago that told the farmer that he should gear up and produce food for a very troubled and very hungry world. It was Government policy that 5 years later then hit the farmer over the head with the grain embargo that destroyed the credibility of the United States as a reliable supplier of grain, and continued trade sanctions by this administration that kept the embargo on.

Add to these problems all the talk about this market-oriented farm program which most farmers agree with in principle, the uncertainty that is created by the writing of the 1985 farm bill, and the proposed budget cuts for fiscal year 1986, and we have a credit crisis created in part by a crisis in faith. The farmer is an eternal optimist. He would never put the seed in the ground if he were not optimistic. But the low commodity prices and the falling land values have destroyed that optimism, and the USDA, by its own projection, says that if their market-oriented program is adopted, there will be an improvement in price. But what improvement? We are talking about $2.50 wheat and $2 corn, and that improvement will take place not in 2 years, maybe 3, maybe 4.

As we colleagues know, I do not think the farmer in Missouri or the farmer in Nebraska or Iowa or in Kansas who has suffered through the last 5 years, with their prices that have been below the cost of production, to wait for that kind of an improvement in price is a purgatory without end. To the lender who is financing the farmer, he knows that probably 30 to 40 percent of his borrowers cannot wait this same time period for the so-called improvement in commodity prices.

This crisis in faith in farm country needs to be addressed, and it needs to be addressed right now. If we wait for legislation to pass both Houses and be signed into law, it will be too late.

So I am urging the administration to address the problem immediately by offering our producers and lenders advance CCC price support loan guarantees to the producers of the 1985 crops. These guarantees, equal in value to the estimated production of the farmer, would shore up the credit system and enable the farmer to get back in the fields and to do their spring planting. This could be done, I add again, without legislation.

I submit that without some cool thinking and some quick action on our part, the dominoes in the farm credit system will be falling, and we have already seen some fall. Make no mistake about it: The shock waves will not be limited only to farm country; they will be felt on both coasts and beyond, all the way through our business and financial communities.

Even a quick glance at the statistics, as the gentleman has pointed out from the State of Missouri, and my colleague has pointed out, clearly show that. In my own State of Kansas, we have 628 banks that hold 34 percent of the Kansas farm debt. Those banks have assets of $1.8 billion. By anyone's measure, a producer leveraged at 70 percent debt to assets is in deep trouble.

Yet, and I would urge my colleagues to listen very carefully to this, the producers in that crisis category hold 25 percent of the Kansas banks' farm debt. That debt amounts to $670 million, a third of the banks' assets. That is the domino I am talking about.

Mr. Speaker, that is big trouble. It is spread up and down the line throughout the farm credit system to the point that many are saying the entire system's stability is in danger. I think we have a clear precedent for action in the cast of the Continental Bank in Illinois where intervention was needed to prevent serious damage to the Nation's financial system. I think such action is necessary in our farm situation only if we fail to take quick action to prevent the rapidly rolling snowball from becoming a real avalanche.

I would like to ask my colleague to speak to this particular issue as well. We hear an awful lot about the cost of the farm program and how we have rolled up billions and billions of dollars in terms of expenses. May I point out, and I know the gentleman, as I do, goes out to his district and has numerous meetings with farmers, and I do not know of any farmer in my district who has asked for this kind of a hodge-podge farm program. I do not know of any farmer in my district who wants these kinds of outlays straight from the Treasury. All he wanted was a price, and the price that we are paying today, and I would urge attention to this by my urban colleagues, is the price of using agriculture, if you will, for foreign policy purposes and defense purposes, for cheap food, inexpensive food, in this town.

Those are the costs that should be tied directly to the cost of the farm program. They are defense costs, foreign policy costs, and others. The farmer does not want this cost, does not want this kind of thing. He would buy the free-market philosophy if we could get there from here, but how to get there from here is the question. It has to be an orderly transition.

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from the Second District of Kansas.

Mr. SLATTERY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I am oftentimes asked, even when I am visiting urban constituents in my district, and certainly when I am visiting with our colleagues who represent urban areas in this body, what it is that we should do for agriculture.

I guess my initial response is that the first and most important thing that we can do at the Federal level for agriculture is to quit doing it to agriculture. I think that message has to be clearly communicated to people all over this country, that in fact over the last few years we have really done it to agriculture with huge deficits causing high interest rates and the overvalued dollar which has destroyed their export markets in many cases. That is what has to be done; we have to correct this policy that is in effect hammering rural America.

If we had not pursued these policies over the last few years, we would not be in the situation where agriculture has to come to the Federal Government for some kind of immediate assistance. But the long-term solution certainly has to be dealt with in the macroeconomic realm of getting the deficit down as a first step toward the reduction of interest rates and the valuation of the dollar.

So, Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for yielding, and I appreciate the efforts of both gentlemen in this regard.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman mentioned the fact that American agriculture has paid the price for many other things in the country. Let me remind the gentleman that American agriculture has paid the price for monetary policy from the Federal Reserve which certainly has helped the economy in the sense of keeping down inflation, but we have paid for it more than any other sector of this economy because of the high capital costs of American agriculture. That tight-money policy is maybe too tight, some of us have felt in the past, and it has really now been brought home to roost, if you will, this spring when farmers are having to face these dire prospects, and I would hope that, through some availability of credit out here, we can try to solve the problem—not to dig the credit hole deeper, as the gentleman is fond of saying, because that is not going to solve anybody's problem. It is going to be an act of survivorship in the next 30 days. That is what the gentleman is pointing out.

But we need to have a program that is going to work. As I said, the farmers do not want a bailout, but it is not going to help to have us go and talk about a free-market-oriented system when there is no free market. Once you leave the shores of this Nation, there is no free market with the Europeans, with their subsidies, and there is no free market with the strong dollar overseas.

David Stockman, our former colleague here, says farmers have brought this on themselves. But no farmers in my district asked for droughts, they did not ask for floods and droughts last year and in the same year, they did not ask for the high dollar, and they did not ask for the big deficits that we have all passed.

I think we have got to call it like it is. The farmers have been buffeted by forces beyond their control. That is why they are frustrated, that is why they are committing suicide, that is why they are having all these terrible events out in rural America. The gentleman is right. It is not going to stop in Dodge City; it is going to go across that prairie from coast to coast.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Surely, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, the essential point is exactly what the gentleman says, and more to the point of what my colleague, the gentleman from Kansas, has pointed out, at these farm meetings over and over again farmers are in agreement with David Stockman; we want a spending freeze; we want to get there from here.

Where is it written in stone that the Federal Government cannot exist on the same level of expenditures for 2 years in a row? They ask time and time again, "Why can't we have a spending freeze?"

Maybe he is doing us a favor by holding our collective feet to the fire so we can have that spending freeze and get there from here. We have taken some cuts. We froze the target price last year. No other entitlement program—and I do not even like to give it that kind of a label—no other program has had that kind of a freeze.

So the farmer wants to get that budget deficit down, and he will go with a spending freeze if we can get there from here in this body.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his leadership.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his comments and for his wisdom through the years of being on the Agriculture Committee and being so involved with the farm issues. We certainly look for guidance from the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

In line with what you were talking about, grain embargoes of the type imposed by Jimmy Carter, Gerald Ford, and others, certainly they interrupt the free market. At farm forums that I held, people pointed out that it is not just grain embargoes but, for example, when our Government decides it is in our best interests as a country to limit textile imports from China, and that certainly is interfering with the normal marketplace and would invite retaliation by China with respect to the purchase of U.S. wheat. The people out there know that all these things by Republican and Democratic administrations have a tendency to interfere with the free marketplace.

So when we talk about the free marketplace and then do things continually to interfere, for good reasons or at least for reasons they think are good, it leaves the farmer with the chant of "free market" but no free market to operate in.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is correct when he points that out, and, as I said before, there is no free market when he gets out there and competes with the French. The French farmer is not any more efficient than the North Dakota farmer, but he is able to outsell him in many cases because of the hidden subsidies and the direct subsidies available to the EC. It is that unfair competition we are fighting.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER]. The gentleman from Nebraska, while not on the Agriculture Committee, is on the Foreign Affairs Committee, and he knows a lot of what we have talked about in the context of global strategy and international relations that impact upon the American farmer. He represents a number of farmers, and he certainly has been quite involved with those of us who have been trying to generate constructive proposals dealing with the farm crisis. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER].

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Missouri for yielding and for taking the time for this special order on the problems of agriculture, particularly the immediate agriculture credit restructuring problems that plague many of our constituents in rural States.

My colleagues from Nebraska, Kansas, and North Dakota have all spoken in some degree about the level of difficulties that we now face in the Great Plains and Western Corn Belt States, but also in other States that have important agricultural sectors. Those comments about the serious difficulties that are faced cannot be overstated.

In the States of Iowa and Nebraska, for example, in the last year we have seen the failures of 15 banks—all agricultural banks. Those are in addition to State-chartered industrial banks that failed in my own State. We have had a failure of 11 PCA's, 7 across the country, 7 in the last 3 months, and indeed our $80 billion farm credit system faces great difficulties—difficulties that we must be careful not to accentuate.

We need to look very carefully at the current problems in agriculture as a two-track system. First, of course, will relate to the passage of a new 4-year farm bill.

I think it is important to the consideration of that farm bill to determine how the transition will occur. What is the number of years to move from our current condition to a market-oriented agriculture, and what are the very specific steps that must be taken commodity by commodity?

Second, there is the recognition that we do not operate in a free-market-oriented world. Therefore, the export plank and the type of agricultural export assistance available to American agriculture are really critical in making a transition. We are often accused of having agricultural export subsidies. We do, and we do it forthrightly, but the European Economic Community points to the level of subsidy they think we have. An important point to bear in mind, however, is that generally our subsidies are aimed at reducing production while the Europeans use their subsidies to promote exports. So the first beneficiary of our agricultural subsidies to reduce production and to manage supply is not the American taxpayer, not the American farmer, but the French wheat farmer who benefits from an improved market condition, and then along comes his government and subsidizes the export of French grain against American producers.

For the first time in the history of the United States, Western Europe last year raised more wheat than we did. The level of hatches each year in the poultry industry in Europe for each month is highest ever. The level of sugar produced by sugar beets in Europe is at an all-time high. With the value of the dollar being as high as it is, obviously they do not have to use the level of export subsidy to compete against us that they once did.

So the value of the dollar, the increased competition from Western European countries, the worldwide recession that has hurt our export potential in so many Third World countries, and five embargo actions by Presidents of both parties against the American farmer and agribusiness in the last 11 to 12 years certainly have taken their toll.

Yet, despite all this, in 1984 we still had our fourth best export year ever in terms of agricultural exports. We have the potential and productive capacity in this country if we will simply unhinge it.

That is the farm bill. But I think our immediate attention really ought to be directed to the next 4 to 8 weeks when the debt restructuring for American agriculture must be conducted. If it is not conducted, we are talking about a level of devastation in the Great Plains and the Midwest that would make Michigan in 1982 and 1983 look like a picnic. Every kind of institution that we have ever worked to build over 100 to 150 years in our part of the country is in deep jeopardy unless some action is taken to provide debt restructuring for creditworthy farmers and ranchers.

Frankly, I tell my colleagues that despite the fact that the administration's proposal for debt restructuring has taken a step forward from its earlier September initiative by interest buy-down as opposed to principal buydown, it will not work as presently conceived.

It will not work despite the fact that we are gathering in resources to work in our agricultural agencies across the country, especially the Farmers Home Administration, because these agencies are inundated with work. There is no way that they can cope with the kind of debt restructuring decisions that must be taken in the next 4 to 8 weeks.

Bear in mind, my colleagues who perhaps are not directly familiar with agricultural credit, that the Farmers Home Administration credit programs, as important as they are, and the farm credit agencies, the land banks, the PCA's, the cooperative credit associations, still are a minority of the types of financial assistance available and used by American farmers and ranchers. We still must deal with the commercial banking sector.

Last week the Agricultural Banking Division of the American Banking Association put forth its proposal that adapts the current administration program. I have adapted it slightly and will introduce it today or tomorrow as legislation, but very frankly, legislation is not needed. Most of the changes that are being advocated by the agricultural banking division and by this Member of Congress could be initiated administratively.

The most important point is that we must bypass the overloaded Farmers Home Administration system and go directly to agricultural banks with an approved lender arrangement. Approved lender status would be granted automatically to agricultural banks with 25 percent or more of their loan portfolios in agriculturally related loans and other banks upon a 15-day maximum application period. The Federal loan guarantee would be for 90 percent of the agricultural loan. Acceptable cash flow requirements would be dropped from 110 percent to 100 percent of the amount necessary to pay current year operating expenses and reschedule a portion of previous years debts. Banking institutions with approved lender status could go ahead with the approval of loan guarantees not only to restructure existing debt, but also for spring planting and for livestock purchases this year in the next 4 to 6 weeks.

Then over a 5-year period, subject to annual review by both the Farmers Home Administration and by the lending institution, assistance and debt relief can be given to help move this farm and ranch family back to a position where they can demonstrate more than 100-percent cash-flow that is profitable agriculture. That would help us make the transition.

I think also it is important in looking at the debt restructuring problem that we do nothing to complicate the difficult situation our PCA's and land banks now find themselves in. One only has to look at what happened in the Spokane area to know that we must be quite careful about encouraging sound operators to leave those systems and to go to commercial entities.

Now, with an interest buydown program and a 90-percent guarantee, limited to existing bank customers and to customers from failed banks, I think we avoid that particular problem.

I would like to have included in the RECORD at this point a summary of key provisions of my bill:

AGRICULTURAL LOAN GUARANTEE AND DEBT RESTRUCTURING ACT

I. Title one would modify the USDA's Debt Adjustment Program to include the following provisions:

A. The Lender agrees to reduce the interest rate on agricultural loans (existing indebtedness and current operating expenses) from the market level to a rate no greater than the corresponding rate for similar categories of Farmers Home Administration direct loans.

B. Federal loan guarantees of 90% of the principal be provided for qualifying loans.

C. If the borrower can achieve an acceptable cash flow situation with this interest rate write-down, lender agrees to enter into an agreement with the borrower to provide credit for five years provided customer remains financially viable.

D. Existing obligations and operating credit for the next year would be combined under one rate with the terms of amortization tailored by the borrower and lender in each individual situation.

E. Acceptable cash flow means 100% of the amount necessary to pay current year's operating expenses, schedule debt repayment, and reasonable family living expenses. During the guarantee period, borrower must adhere to a closely monitored, austere, operating program that foregoes all but the most necessary capital expenditures.

F. Participating loans would be reviewed annually by the lender and the Farmers Home Administration. If borrower can regain a position of unassisted profitability during this five year period, lender would have the option of discontinuing guarantee and the interest rate write-down. If borrower is determined not to be financially viable under the terms of the loan agreement, FmHA and lender may discontinue providing credit and take appropriate action.

G. FmHA would utilize the "approved lender" process for determining eligibility and loan approval.

H. Application by lending institutions in which 25% of their loan portfolio consists of agricultural loans or loans to agriculturally related businesses would automatically be eligible for approved lender status with the FmHA. Applications by other lending institutions for approved lender status would have to be decided by the FmHA within 15 days.

I. The Secretary of Agriculture would direct the FmHA to make available additional field personnel, equipment and other necessary resources to assist in the timely processing of existing and additional loan activities.

J. Liquidation procedures for the guaranteed loans would be modified to parallel those offered under SBA guarantee loan programs, so as to address the common concern by the lending institutions that guarantees are uncollectable.

K. Priority consideration shall be given by the Farmers Home Administration to operators who have lost their line of credit from either a commercial or Farm Credit System lender due to the failure, closing or liquidation of that institution, and who have been unable to arrange new lines of credit from other private lenders.

Where such borrower is unable to arrange a loan guarantee through another lending institution that is a FmHA approved lender, then the FmHA shall give priority to reviewing the financial condition of such borrower. If such borrower is determined to be economically viable by the FmHA, then the FmHA shall offer credit assistance, including the direct guarantee of a combined loan as set forth in the terms of this legislation. The source of capital for such loan shall come from a pool of capital created and funded by state, local and/or private sources for the purpose of assisting the borrowers of failed, closed or liquidated lending institutions.

L. Loan guarantee authority for such program will be increased from the current $630 Million to $3 Billion.

M. Authority for such loan guarantee authority shall expire at the end of fiscal year 1993.

N. All other provisions of the USDA Debt Adjustment Program as announced in September, 1984 and modified in February, 1985 where not in conflict or contrary to these provisions will be incorporated into this legislation.

O. The provisions of this legislation will be available within 15 days of the enactment of this legislation.

II. Title Two would permit all businesses adversely impacted by the 1983 Payment-in-Kind (PIK) program to apply for SBA nonphysical disaster assistance by eliminating the county eligibility prerequisites of the loan program.

Mr. Speaker, there are many more things that can be said. I think that we will be sytematically trying to communicate with our colleagues in this body and the other body about the difficulties we face because we have a critical 4 to 6 weeks ahead of us.

I thank the gentleman for giving me an opportunity to express my views and ideas on this subject of such critical importance to my constituents.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Could I inquire of the gentleman on his proposal, he said a 90-percent Government guarantee and interest reduction. Who pays the interest reduction? Is that absorbed by the local lender?

Mr. BEREUTER. Yes. The proposal of the Banking Agricultural Banking Division, of the American Banking Association, and the one I accept, is to take their interest rate down to a comparable FHA rate. We are talking about a two and a half or a two and a quarter reduction.

Now, this is their position, so it is an acceptable position to the agricultural banks across the country. That is our best indicator. Obviously, some of us and some of them would like to do better, but I think we need to find something that is politically acceptable, and they tell us this one is.

In contrast to their formal position last September when they warned through their official body, not through the people that were solicited on a quick basis, they told us officially that the principal buydown program simply would not work.

We have added, of course, the further complication of IRS stepping in and hurting farmers in the process by their tax policies related to principle reduction.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I thank the gentleman and as he says, regardless of all the speeches we might make here on the floor of the House and all the hand wringing that might go on, it is going to be a moot point if something is not done in the next 4 weeks, either through administration discretion and the authority they presently have, as the gentleman has pointed out in the past, but by us expediting the bill through our committee system here and sent to the President within less than 2 weeks.

Mr. BEREUTER. Will the gentleman yield for just one more quick point?

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. BEREUTER. The gentleman reminded me of a point I wanted to make, and that is that the farm bill as presented by the administration will certainly be a very dead issue unless action is taken on debt restructuring in the next 6 to 8 weeks.

I go further to say that the administration's program of deficit reduction will be a dead issue, too, if we have devastation in eight or nine States in the Midwest and in the Great Plains.

So Mr. Stockman, you better look at the deficit reduction program, because unless we do something about debt restructuring to help viable farm operations in the meantime, you are going to be dealing with catastrophe in the Midwest and Great Plains that is going to jeopardize and sink the whole debt reduction program.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. What the gentleman also is saying is that there will be economic downslides where we will be sending money out through various entitlement programs in these areas. We must do something positive to shore up the rural areas in this point, but we will be adding on costs later on in the budget which could even supersede what they might think they are going to save on this farm bill, which the gentleman says is not too much alive these days around here.

Mr. BEREUTER. I am absolutely convinced that the costs will be far in excess, and I am talking about direct costs, not human and institutional costs, far in excess of what we know.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I think the message here today and certainly to the administration ought to be, one, to recognize that emergency farm credit is something that must be dealt with before any farm bill is.

Mr. BEREUTER. The gentleman is absolutely right.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. And we will have to do it expeditiously and we want their cooperation and support.

Mr. BEREUTER. Absolutely, and I think we want to make the point to our colleagues that we realize that what we are proposing is not going to assist everyone. It is not going to assist people for whom there has been no light at the end of the tunnel for several years, but it leaves intact those farm operations, I would estimate another fifth or two-fifths, that are likely to tumble into the situation brought about by rapidly declining land values and economic chaos as more and more financial institutions collapse.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri, who has experienced I am sure in his district many of the frustrations that we have experienced in the Sixth Congressional District. We have joined districts with the fourth and, while I think that the weather pattern developed more acutely out of his district, the gentleman certainly has been impacted negatively by many of the forces—weather as well as economic.

I yield now to my friend, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON].

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

I think also I might point out that it is very proper and fitting that this special order be taken out today and I commend the gentleman on doing so.

As we are meeting here today and discussing this problem, it is very apparent that American agriculture is experiencing its greatest period of financial stress that we know of since the Great Depression. There is a gathering storm in middle America as the result of the tremendous agricultural problems that we have. This storm does not begin and end with the American farmer. It does not begin and end with the Missouri farmer, the Nebraska farmer, or the Kansas farmer. This storm goes from the farmer to the small town to the agribusinesses and goes all the way into the industry of our great cities here in our country. Its tentacles go all the way and I say that it is something that we must look at, urge solutions to before it is too late, because I see the storm with the claps of thunder and the terrible clouds that could come and devastate middle America.

I am going to have to agree with the gentleman from Nebraska when he stated that we do not have to pass any additional laws in this body. I think there are on the statutes laws that we have passed as a Congress in days and years past enough for the administration should the spirit and the desire and the interest be there to assist middle America and the American farmers to issue rules and regulations, whether it be for the financial institutions that the gentleman from Nebraska referred to or the farmers themselves.

As we know, the administration back in September issued certain rules and regulations as a program. That did not help much. In recent days another set of rules and regulations was announced.

I am fearful that also will not be of much help. But I think if they are not going to do it we as Congress will have to force the issue. I am prepared to assist to do this.

In the past few years agricultural banks have experienced substantially more losses than nonagricultural banks. Out of 78 bank failures nationwide in 1984, 25 of them were agricultural banks.

In addition, the Production Credit Associations, which we call PCA's, experienced losses in 1984 were expected to total $250 million compared with only $109 million for the entire decade of the 1970's. Five PCA's, five of them, have failed in 1984, and it is predicted that a larger number of them will fail this year.

Thus, as Congress prepares to tackle the 1985 farm bill we must not only look at the farm bill as being something to look down the road for positive, long-range help, but we must look for short-range help because that is what we need to shore up the American farmer today.

I would like to share with you just for a moment an experience I had on Sunday, rather heart rending, but an informative experience. The young farmers in my home county of Lafayette County held a farmers' forum and they invited farmers and members of the agribusiness community into Higginsville Sunday afternoon. Between 800 and 850 people came to this farm forum that the young farmers put on for us.

I was pleased to be the recipient of their comments, farmers, implement dealers, fertilizer dealers, their families were all there, and I not only heard the statistics and the pain and the problems that they are going through, I saw the very human side of this problem. Many of them are threatened with losing their farms, farms that have been in their family for generations. Good farmers, good managers, people who know how to farm and do well, but as you know, through the years, recent years, they have everything stacked against them: the weather, as you have so aptly pointed out, I would say to my colleague from Missouri [Mr. COLEMAN] and the high interest rates, the high cost of production, low prices. All of those things have combined together with a high dollar overseas which have wreaked havoc with our agricultural exports. All of these together at the same time have caused this situation.

There were a number of people who spoke, some very eloquently, some not so eloquently but with great understanding of the farm problems. But there was a young man, a young FFA student, who spoke. I will never forget his words and the sincerity in the ring of what he said. He said he wants to be able to farm like his father has farmed on their tract of land, and he also wanted to make a living on it.

That is the American dream that this FFA boy has and so many down the road have.

Surveys at our meeting were distributed as to suggested proposals that have been put forward by the administration and also by Members of Congress. I wish to tell you today that I will be pleased to have these tabulated. The young farmers in Lafayette County are tabulating them for us now and when that is finished I will share those results with you, because there was a true cross section not just of Lafayette County but from the various counties. And may I say a number from the gentleman's district came across the river and attended our forum. I will be pleased to share that with you and with the Members of this body.

Congress must look forward to solving the short-term problem and we must also look forward to restoring on the long term the agricultural economy.

I will work as an individual and also as the chairman of the congressional rural caucus to this end.

We must also point out that it is a matter of understanding. The best bargain in America, the best bargain which one gets in America is the food that we eat. This we must explain not just to our colleagues who live in the large cities, but to those in the administration who do not understand the problem.

I thank the gentleman for this special order and the opportunity to participate in it.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I thank the gentleman for his fine contribution.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. At this time I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON].

Mr. GUNDERSON. I appreciate the gentleman yielding and will try to be brief. I recognize he wants to sum up his remarks at the end.

For those who are interested, I have submitted a statement into the RECORD today that deals with a comprehensive credit package.

I think what I want to say, however, is directed toward those people from the cities who might be listening. I think it is important to understand how did this happen. Who are we dealing with?

We have talked about significant factors above and beyond the control of the farmers, and when we are talking about credit needs this spring we are not talking about the guy who has a delinquent Farmers Home loan or the guy who has a delinquent commercial loan. There are programs in effect to deal with those.

What we are talking about is the person who is a good farmer and a good manager and can cash-flow their operation, but because of the depressed land values does not have the collateral and therefore is being turned away from the commercial banks and the PCA's and the farm credit system. They are going to the Farmers Home as first time, new applicants for an operating loan.

In the State of Wisconsin we have been told 80 percent of those applicants are not going to be served because the Farmers Home simply does not have the money and that is why it is so urgent that we come up with some kind of credit guarantee and initiative in the very short term.

I yield back to the gentleman.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Of course, as a member of the Agriculture Committee he is in a position to certainly speak up and do something about this particular issue.

Mr. Speaker, in summary let me say I guess that the message is out there and it is not that we wanted to talk to each other today, but we wanted to communicate with the people on all sides, on both sides of the aisle. It is not just a rural issue; it is an urban issue, it is a national issue.

Where else can you find a national issue recognized as such when you are on the front cover of Newsweek and Time magazine and you have front page stories in the New York Times, who is not known for covering farm issues, as well as the Wall Street Journal and the Washington Post? They recognize that this is more than just a rural, Midwest problem; it is a national problem that has to be addressed.

It is not a Democrat problem and it is not a Republican problem. We have seen participation here today by both sides of the aisle and in a further special order following this one I hope we see that, too.

We must work together. We must work together starting this Thursday when we have a markup on the emergency farm credit bill in the Subcommittee on Conservation and Credit of the Agriculture Committee. And as the ranking Republican on this subcommittee, let me tell my colleagues that I stretch and reach my hand across the aisle so that we can together help solve this problem and work to help the people that we represent in the best way that we can. Put partisanship aside and we will try to do what is right.

I ask all of us to consider that as we see 20 percent of our Nation's farmers faced with very bleak and dire prospects of going out of business and of losing the family farm and of having to seek jobs elsewhere. And in these rural areas there are not jobs to go to. We are going to have massive job retraining and we are going to see a tremendous influx into the cities. It is going to affect all of us here and I hope we can prepare for it and do what we we can in the time that we have.

THE 67TH ANNIVERSARY OF PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE OF ESTONIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MCKINNEY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I feel it is of great importance to recognize the upcoming 67th anniversary of the proclamation of independence of Estonia.

This tiny Baltic state, with only 1.5 million inhabitants, was brutally coerced into signing away their independence. Ever since the fateful Soviet takeover, Estonians have lost the right to govern themselves. Their human rights also have been severely violated.

Estonia achieved its independence along with Latvia and Lithuania following the end of World War I. On February 4, 1918, Estonia declared its independence; a democratic parliamentary system of government was adopted. This new system was tested under fire when an attempted Bolshevik takeover in 1924, was successfully thwarted. As a result, the Communist party of Estonia was banned. Estonia, with a sophisticated and well-educated people, became a thriving independent state. A diversified economy that ranged from fishing and agriculture to advanced industrial techniques was primarily responsible for the high standard of living. Oil shale deposits along the northern coast were a great source of energy. Estonia, as a whole was a young, healthy democracy in Eastern Europe.

Unfortunately, the flourishing Nation soon became the target of Soviet expansionism. On August 23, 1939, representatives of Hitler and Stalin signed the Nazi-Soviet nonaggression pact, relegating Estonia to the Soviet sphere of influence. This was a precursor of what was to follow. First, Estonia was forced to sign a mutual assistance treaty with the U.S.S.R. The terms of the treaty provided that the Soviet Union would respect the sovereignty, the State structure and the social systems of Estonia, while the U.S.S.R. would be allowed to build military bases on Estonian soil. It was only a matter of time until the treaty was broken. In 1940, Soviet troops entered the Baltic States. Pro-Soviet governments were imposed and rigged elections were held. Those elections later led to petitions requesting that the three Baltic States, Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia, be incorporated into the U.S.S.R. Sadly, the Baltic States were annexed in 1940. The Soviet annexation shattered Estonia's political evolution. A flowering democracy was poisoned.

The condition of Estonia today is vastly different from those glory days of independence. Recently, industrial growth fell to zero. Also, a reduction in food supplies has hurt everyone living in Estonia. These two factors have been prime contributors to the rapidly falling standards of living. Furthermore, the Soviets have exploited the oil shale deposits used for thermal energy production and the chemical industry. This natural resource is disappearing at an ever-increasing rate. And, as a result of the increased mining efforts, there has been a great deal of environmental degradation.

Far beyond economic and environmental troubles, there is the problem of infringements on Estonian human, civil, and political rights. The Soviets have persecuted those people attempting to defend Estonian rights, charging them with anything from hooliganism to anti-Soviet activities. The penalty for such crimes in internment in prison camps, labor camps, or even exile. In March 1983, there was a wave of Estonia-wide house searches and interrogations of people involved in human rights advocacy. This is an example of total disregard for human rights.

Moreover, the Soviet attitude on emigration is extremely rigid. Four families have been seeking emigration to the United States for more than 6 years, while at least nine families have been denied permission to emigrate to Israel. Emigration is discouraged through intimidation and harassment.

For those Estonians who wish to remain, their deeply anchored ethnic roots are being ruthlessly abused. There is a Russification project underway in Estonia. The Russian language is being forced on schoolchildren and businessmen alike. Moreover, by 1983, Estonia was made up of only 63 percent ethnic Estonians, compared to 92 percent in 1939.

Today, the Soviets continue to make vague charges such as "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda" against Estonians trying to exercise their political rights, including the defense of Estonian national autonomy. There have been many uprisings over this political right. In 1980, students demanded better school conditions as well as freedom for Estonia. They protested the Russian occupation and demanded an end to it. The result was a swift, violent crackdown by Soviet authorities.

The Soviets denounce any religious influence that could potentially restrict their power. In Estonia there have been countless attacks on the influence of the Lutheran Church. Persecution of religious leaders is widespread. Many pastors have been called in for questioning while others have lost their licenses. These actions by the Soviets have compounded the severe shortage of pastors in the region.

Almost all ethnic Estonians are protesting the Soviet annexation of their land. The widening gap in their society between native and foreigner is creating an ever-growing conflict between the leaders and the led. The only way to correct the problem is to return to the democratic society so many Estonians desire.

In closing, I would like to stress that the annexation of a healthy, free-thinking democracy has resulted in the creation of a totalitarian police state. Estonian history is proof of what could happen if this nation attains freedom again. Let us remember this 67th anniversary so that we can work to realize the day when the free world can celebrate the second independence of Estonia.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

THE STATE OF AGRICULTURE IN AMERICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE] is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this special hour is to report on the state of agriculture as we have seen it in our week at home. Members on both sides of the aisle, and we have already seen, have been home to view the circumstances.

What I have seen in South Dakota is certainly the most incredible economic devastation that my generation has ever witnessed. At least 25 percent of our small businessmen and our farmers will be gone in 12 months if absolutely nothing is done. Farmers who have survived life-threatening situations in the days of the early pioneers, who have survived the Great Depression, who have survived nearly every onslaught that nature could devise for more than a century, cannot survive the disastrous situation we have in South Dakota and across the country today.

In the shadow of one of the most remarkable monuments to democracy ever created, around Mount Rushmore, are monuments now equally as breathtaking; monuments of failed farm economic policies in numbers never before experienced in my State; thousands upon thousands of family farms. As the harsh winter winds whistled through the grain-bordered windows I have seen an eerie death in those buildings where only life was recently seen.

Farm families are literally disappearing into the night to avoid confrontation with the sheriff coming to take possession the next day.

My admiration goes to the farm wives, the partners in life who shoulder the agony, who have given it all when all seemed lost.

One farm wife told me last week that in her 20 years she and her husband have survived droughts and floods, embargoes and grasshoppers, even a fire; but surviving all of this is not as difficult as what they have had to survive this year. But some have not survived at all.

A rural banker was recently shot and killed.

A farmer and his wife have been reported as having committed suicide. Proud people stubbornly accustomed to keeping problems to themselves are meeting by the thousands.

Last week I spoke to one group of more than 7,000 family farmers and in a dozen farm gatherings around the State I could not find rooms big enough to hold them all. In a matter of days people from all over South Dakota have sent dollars to the State legislature to send them to Washington so they could come to the Congress and appeal to the President for help right now.

Next Monday they will be here.

A quiet desperation has turned into angry public outcry. And as this outcry becomes louder, David Stockman's comments about farmers only underscores our need to act responsibly. Compassion, responsible action are not four-letter words. In fact there was a joke going around South Dakota last week that a modern miracle was attempted just last week; they attempted to put a human heart in our Budget Director and he rejected it.

His comments would only be humorous if they were not so tragic. If he could only witness the agony. If he could only stand in the middle of a family now abandoned and feel the death where once there was life.

What are all the answers? I do not have them all. No one does. But it goes way beyond one piece of farm legislation and what that can deliver.

I have some ideas on what we should and should not do. First, as my colleague from Missouri just mentioned, let us not fingerpoint. Sure it is a congressional responsibility and of course it is partly our fault; but so is it the fault of the White House and the statehouses across this land. Blaming someone, however, is not going to solve anything at all.

Second, while I am not going to say it is entirely the fault of David Stockman's, it certainly is not the fault of the family farmer, either.

Then what we must argue for is something responsible, something positive, something that will show a cohesive action immediately; and for David Stockman to argue that we take away the tools of economic recovery is like arguing for the Pentagon to remove the tanks and artillery in an American war.

You do not do it in a military crisis and you do not do it in an economic or agricultural one either.

Having argued for that action, we must do it now. In both the short and the long term I believe.

In the long term I believe the action can only be described with two words: better price. Only with a better price can we bring genuine prosperity, and a better price does not depend upon dollars from the Federal Government, it does not depend on a bigger budget.

Anyone who mistakes what we call for as a better price as calling in the same breath for more Federal dollars is wrong.

We need a better price but not at the expense of the Federal Government. We need a better price and only in an era of lower interest rates. To get that better price we must build a bridge, a bridge from here to there; a short-term emergency credit bridge for economic credit, for operating loans, for refinancing outstanding indebtedness. In the last couple of weeks we have organized a bipartisan coalition to build that bridge.

H.R. 1035 will do just that. First it provides emergency operating credit to the advancement of 50 percent of commodity credit loans, available now for operating purposes. Second it would offer a 90-percent guarantee to PCA's and lending institutions to reorganize outstanding indebtedness at a lower rate of interest to give farmers the breathing room they need to build to a better price.

We have a commitment from the leadership to support and move this legislation through the House. We will be marking up that bill or something very similar on Thursday. I strongly urge administration and House support for that legislation.

Someone recently said, in fact quoted, someone who has said for a long time that it is "better to light one candle than to curse the darkness," Well, I believe H.R. 1035 is that candle. Legislation such as this will generate the heat we need to persuade the administration that action must be taken now so that farmers can go back to doing what they do best, so they can go back and farm.

That is the purpose of our special order, that is the purpose of this legislation.

I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from South Dakota for yielding and for his statement.

Mr. Speaker, the Congressman from South Dakota has taken the lead in this body in trying to develop some solutions to what all of us know is a very serious problem.

Like the gentleman from South Dakota I spent the recess around my district, in my case holding nine farm forums throughout North Dakota. We had in those nine farm forums about 4,000 to 5,000 farmers come to talk about what the situation is out there on the farm—and it is tough.

I thought maybe I would share with the House several of the things I heard along the way, some of it with a touch of irony.

One elderly fellow stood up in one of the farm forums and said, "You know, I am so old I am starting in on my second depression now," and he meant it because he went on to describe what he is facing. He has been around a long time but he may not make it.

Another fellow about his age stood up at one of the farm forums in Williston, ND, and he said, "Don't tell me about abandoning price supports, don't tell me Government is a problem. Sure we have had some trouble with Government programs but I was around farming in the old days, in the final days of the Herbert Hoover administration.

I farmed under Herbert Hoover with no Government price supports and I sold wheat here in Williston, ND, for 27 cents a bushel. So don't tell me about the good old days. We won't have any farmers left if we don't have some kind of a basic price support system," he said.

Another fellow told me about the days when he sold sheep. He sold a load of sheep at the Twin Cities livestock markets and he sent them on the railroad to the Twin Cities to be marketed and the sheep did not bring enough to cover the freight bill. The railroad company said, "You know, you sheep did not bring enough money to cover the freight." He told the railroad, "Look, I do not have any more money but I could send you some more sheep."

He said, "Those are the good old days, those are the days without price supports; those are the days in which farmers were rolling the dice in the marketplace completely, with an opportunity to go broke quickly if those international grain price and commodity prices swung down and stayed down."

A woman told me at the start of my farm forums, "You know, you folks in public office, all you do now is talk about the crisis of the moment. I am a little tired of hearing about farm prices. All we hear about is the family farmer and the trouble the farms are involved in. Nobody talks about other troubles.

"I have a son who is an engineer, living in Illinois and who is out of work. Nobody talks about those kind of problems."

I said. "Well, who did your son work for?" She said "John Deere."

And I said, "If the price of grain were $5 a bushel for wheat, your son would still be an engineer for John Deere."

There is an immediate impact in all of this country's economy when the health of agriculture's economy improves.

What I would like to do for just a moment is to talk about some of the things that we have discussed here in Congress to describe what some solutions might be for this problem.

David Stockman, his partner, John Block, and President Reagan have all said what we need to do now is to abandon farm price supports.

Well, the gentleman from South Dakota said it well; you would not abandon defense spending in the middle of a conflict; you would not abandon spending for health care in the middle of an epidemic; and it seems to me it would be fundamentally foolish to talk about abandoning the farm price support system in the middle of a farm crisis.

These folks who talk about abandoning a farm price support system are really talking about abandoning the family farmer, phasing out the family farmers across this land.

Now who is in trouble? Well, the people that I saw at the farm forums in North Dakota that are in the most desperate trouble are the people who are in their late twenties to late thirties who have been farming for 5 to 15 years. They have a little higher debt load, and the fact is when prices went down and stayed down, and interest rates went up and stayed up, they created conditions that these young farmers cannot overcome.

These people will go broke unless we do something to intervene. It is within our power to do that. We have to ask ourselves and we have to ask the Secretary of Agriculture, the President, and even the Budget Director, do we care whether there is a network of family farms across this country or don't we?

If we do not care, then let us go on down that road and abandon farm price supports and end up with a system of giant corporate agrifactories producing the food at a much higher price to the consumer. But if we do care, as I think we should, about maintaining a network of family farms similar to the care expressed by other governments and other industrial nations who understand that a rural network of family farms is important to their country, then we have to do something now to straighten out this farm program.

We need three things: One is credit. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE] and I and some others have worked on a short-term credit approach. Republicans and Democrats have come together here to see if we can develop some short-term credit approaches that give some of these folks a chance. They need a chance to see the long run.

In other to do that, you have to give them some short-term credit. I was looking yesterday at the credit we have been so generous to provide the rest of the world, and we have been very generous. If you are Chile, you get credit for 2 percent; if you are Pakistan, you can get a loan from the U.S. Government for 2 percent; Poland, 4.5 percent; Yugoslavia, 3.5 percent—you can go on and on down the list.

Then when those foreign governments get in trouble with their loans, our Government says to them: Well, we are willing to renegotiate; we will extend; we will write down the terms; we will postpone payment.

Now through our Farmers Home Administration, when the family farmer is in trouble and cannot make payment, do we extend the same largesse we extend to some of these foreign governments? Oh, no. Now we say to those farmers, "Well, we don't want to extend. We don't want to renegotiate. We don't want to write down terms. What we want you to do is go out of business."

Farmer after farmer stood up at those meetings and said, "I have been counseled by my Farmers Home Administration that I am not making any progress and I really ought to quit farming."

What kind of a government is it that counsels agriculture's future to get out of agriculture? That says to young farmers, "You ought to quit." That is not a government that has its priorities right.

So we need a short-term credit program, and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE] and others have been working in a group; I have been part of that group; to see if we cannot come up with a solution.

I think we have arrived at some approaches that are good, which the gentleman has just described.

Second, we need a price support system that really does what it is supposed to do; provide a bridge over those price depressions; a bridge over which family farms can move during periods of sustained low commodity prices.

It does not have to be a price support under every gallon of milk produced by the 5,000 milk cows in the morning on the largest dairy operations in the country; it does not mean we have to have a loan rate under every bushel of wheat or barley or corn produced by the largest producers in America; it just means a basic price support over which family farmers can travel when they cannot make it with viscious international downturns in the grain market.

We can do that this year in a new 4-year farm bill, if we all work together for the same purpose.

Finally and most important, I think we have to find new markets. If there is anything that I discovered out there in North Dakota last week and I am sure you all have in this body, it is that most farmers understand that we can pile some more debt on their shoulders, but that is not going to solve the problem in the long term.

In the long term, somebody has to have a better price to pay for all of that. If you do not get a better price, you are not ever going to make it.

So what we have to do is search for additional markets. I am convinced that international barter is one; I am convinced that we have to be much more aggressive in attempting to compete with the European Economic Community through a number of devices. I am convinced that we have to tighten our grain standards, through the FGIS, in order to make our wheat as clean and as marketable as our competitors.

There are a number of things we can do to move that grain into markets overseas that we are now reaching. If we do all of those things, then I think we can create conditions in which family farmers can make a go of it.

You hear a lot about the word "subsidy." We hear a lot of people say, "If you provide a price support for agriculture, you are providing a subsidy for farmers."

Again, I think a farmer in North Dakota at one of my farm forums put it best. He said this:

> When I produce wheat and sell it at the local elevator and get $3.40 a bushel for it, after it cost me $4.10 a bushel to produce, I have a hard time believing anybody is subsidizing me. I happen to believe I am subsidizing the person, someplace else in this country, who is eating what I produced and what I sold for much less than the cost of production.

I want to commend the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE] and others for their work on this issue. This issue is not going to go away; the pressure is going to build, and we have the opportunity to do the right thing or the wrong thing.

If all of us who believe as you and I do that this country desperately needs a network of family farms for its own security, for its own economic health, work together, I think we can do the right thing and have a long-term, consistent, stable farm policy that gives those farmers who are good managers an opportunity to make a living.

When you talk about defense, it is not just building a tank or a gun or a jet fighter that is the defense in this country. It is also the ability of a strong country to produce its own food supply and also food supplies for much of the rest of the world.

That is an important part of American security, and we ought to keep talking about that when we analyze what we want American policy for agriculture to be in the coming decade.

Mr. DASCHLE. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska, a very active Member in all of this and an important member of the Banking Committee.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank my colleague and neighbor for yielding to me, very briefly because I know you have many speakers waiting.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman made reference a few minutes ago to your legislators visiting next week, and it was appropriate that you did that, and it reminded me that all of the Members of the House from Midwestern and Great Plains States have in their office a letter from me soliciting your signature on a request to the President that our legislators may directly visit with the President when they come here next week as a part of a National Conference of State Legislative Leaders meeting here.

I would appreciate the Members taking a look at that. I think it is important, despite the difficulties involved, that the President hear directly from so many State legislators that are taking the time to come back here.

They do have an important agenda already set up including visits with the Vice President, but I very much would like to see you add your weight in a bipartisan effort to insure that the President directly gets the message and it does not get stopped at OMB or other points.

I thank the gentleman for permitting me to make this announcement, and I commend him for taking this special order on this crucial subject.

Mr. DASCHLE. I thank the gentleman. I would give the gentleman my commitment right now. I would love to sign it, and will do so this afternoon.

There are two branches of Government that are both responsible for action on this issue, and unless we get both into action in a bipartisan manner, nothing will be done, so I commend the gentleman for his letter and urge all of our colleagues to sign it, at the earliest possible time.

At this time, I yield to my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SLATTERY].

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from South Dakota for his leadership in this effort and for his continuing hard work on the Agriculture Committee.

Last week, I participated in two Budget Committee hearings; one in Lansing, MI, and one in Atchison, KS, which focused on the Federal budget as it affects agriculture.

In both places, the committee heard from farmers, agribusiness leaders, local community leaders, and others, and the message was very clear. That message is that we have a crisis in farm country.

Some have called it a debt crisis, but frankly, I prefer to call it a profit crisis.

Another clear message is that market-oriented agriculture, as specifically expressed in the President's budget which calls for, among other things, sharp reductions in loan levels and target prices, the elimination of soil conservation funds, elimination of Federal funding for ASCS offices, phasing out REA, and sharp cutbacks in the farm credit program is unacceptable at this time.

The bottom line, according to the economists that we heard at these hearings, is very simple and that is that farm commodity prices would decline during the next few years if the President's program was enacted. This means lower farm income at a time when more than 40 percent of our farmers in rural America are struggling to meet debt service on their current debt load and make ends meet.

The unanimous view of those testifying is that the deficit is causing high interest rates and the overvalued dollar, which is of course devastating their export markets. Those testifying made it clear that the $180 billion deficit in the President's budget is absolutely totally unacceptable. And, frankly, I share their frustration in that they just cannot understand why we cannot dramatically reduce this deficit.

There are a number of things we can and must do, however, on a bipartisan basis in the short term to alleviate the problems we are facing in rural America. I commend the gentleman from South Dakota for his leadership with H.R. 1035 that sets up a different program for debt restructuring, that would allow for an advance of one-half of the Commodity Credit Corporation's loans. These things will help and we should move on these quickly.

We should not cut the soil conservation program as this administration has suggested. In my judgment, we should retain our commitment to soil conservation and, indeed, expand it so that we can basically hit two birds with one stone. We will achieve soil conservation, but we will also move some highly erodible marginal land from grain production into a soil conservation usage. We should not dramatically reduce the loan levels as the President is requesting either.

We should have tax reform and this is something that a lot of people I do not think have focused on yet. One of the things we can do that would not cost the Federal Government a dime and would, in fact, generate additional revenue for the Federal Government is to limit the amount of farm losses that can be written off against nonfarm income. This is something the people out in farm country clearly understand and something we should be moving on.

I think we should also target the amount of Government grain payments or any other kind of payments to farmers. The $1 million grain payments that we have heard about are totally unacceptable.

We should have a long-term program in place at planting time also. I think Governor Carlin at our hearing in Atchison, KS, made a very good point when he pointed out that over the last few years the wheat farmers in Kansas did not even know the rules of the game at the time they put their seed in the ground. This kind of mismanagement is totally unacceptable. We can improve that management and it will not cost the Government any money to do it.

The other point he made, which I think is very, very good was the need to set the rules. He pointed out how difficult it would be, for example, in the oil industry if you were changing the rules of the game every 3 or 4 years. In the auto industry if you had to renegotiate the whole economic environment within which you were going to operate every 3 or 4 years. How difficult would it be to survive in such an environment?

Mr. Speaker, I am confident that we can put together a farm program that will cost a lot less than PIC and be a lot better for farmers, a lot better for all Americans. That is certainly our challenge. The farmers do not want charity. They want a fair price for their product and the opportunity to make a decent living for their families. Farmers and others in farm country believe that the deficit is particularly harmful to them. They are absolutely right. There have been some big winners during our recent economic recovery. I think we all accept that and we are appreciative for that. But the fact of the matter is that there have been some losers in our recent economic recovery. Businesses that are capital intensive like farming and depend on exports like farming, have been victims of a double whammy. I think it is important for us to move quickly to rectify this problem.

The short-term emergency measures that we have talked abut are very important. But the long-term solution will not be achieved unless we restore some common sense and indeed some sanity to our Nation's tax and spend policies and dramatically reduce the deficit.

The President's proposed deficit of $180 billion is totally unacceptable. We have to do better than this. If we would quit hammering rural America with huge deficits that cause high interest rates, that in turn cause the dollar to be overvalued by 30 or 40 percent, the farmers and others in rural America would not need anything from the Federal Government.

I believe that we can, and indeed we must, move as quickly as we can to deal with the short-term solutions and I recognize that those short-term solutions are not going to cure the problem, but it will certainly take the pressure off.

As we do that we have to be moving on another track and the other track has got to deal with the deficit problem. If we fail on the deficit, we have failed rural America and we have failed the future of this country.

The policies that we are currently pursuing with regard to our tax and spend policies are nothing more than mortgaging the future of America. It is the farmers who are being hit first and they are the first of many if we fail to address this issue.

I thank the gentleman again for his leadership in this area. I think it is important for all of us who represent those areas in rural America to keep the pressure on. Unfortunately, as someone once observed, our Government does not always respond, as we would like, to logic and reason. It responds to pressure. I believe it is important for all of us out in our part of the country to keep the heat on.

I thank the gentleman for his leadership.

Mr. DASCHLE. I thank the gentleman from Kansas, a cosponsor of H.R. 1035, for his eloquent remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I yield at this time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. THOMAS], a member of the House Agriculture Committee, a very active participant in this effort.

Mr. THOMAS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, as a farmer myself prior to my election to Congress in 1982, I come here today before this body with mixed emotions. In the past few weeks we have seen the headlines, in fact, even this week in Newsweek and Time highlighting the farm crisis across this country to date.

In the past few days and weeks we have heard testimony by the American Bankers Association, the Independent Bankers Association, and the Farm Credit Council, and the consensus seems to be that if the current credit crisis in agriculture goes unabated and unattended that perhaps we will lose as many as 15 percent of the 600,000 commercial farmers, those doing $40,000 a year in sales annually and above in this year. The scenario has been pretty well depicted. We have a record farm debt of some $220 billion. We have record low farm income. We now have plummeting land prices and record foreclosures. In the last half of 1984 of some 40 banks, 22 of them that failed, and this was a record of course since the depression, were agricultural banks and even today, this morning, we are told that 39 percent of all of the troubled banks in this country to date are agricultural banks.

I am happy to see these comments, not because it is good news, but because it is the news. Finally, it is in the headlines.

But, on the other hand, there are other comments that concern me as well. I hear the comments about our farmers being consenting adults who simply mismanaged and were greedy. I have heard a leading editorial that referred to the entire issue really as just a passing away and the sweeping away from the scene of some misty-eyed visage of 19th-century pastoral way of life. And most confusing of all and frightening are the comments that this is just a normal adjustment that we are passing through and the country will be none the worse after we have experienced it.

Well, I want to make a few points and much of this has been spoken already, but I would like to reiterate these comments.

The truth is that we are truly in a credit crisis of both short- and long-term proportions and that the debt issue in this country in agriculture has truly become a driving force within itself.

Second, that we are not talking about some pastoral way of life but this Nation's largest industry, creating one-fifth of the total gross national product of this country and that we are now down to really cutting the meat and the bone from the farm structure; no longer are we just paring the fat.

Third, that this is not just some normal and orderly adjustment. But the stage is set for what will be a literal holocaust in rural America that will unquestionably have devastating effects on the entire economy.

Let me briefly go back for just a moment so that we can establish why there is a Federal responsibility. It was in the decade of the seventies when we encouraged our farmers in this country to plant fence row to fence row. We opened up the markets of the world. We made the credit easy. We needed the money to buy the foreign oil which was going through the roof.

During that period of time inflation went through the roof as well and land values rose through the roof and then it was during that same period that the first of three embargoes in 1974, 1975, and then in 1980 devastated and shook our credibility as reliable suppliers on those markets.

But the truth is that in that decade when we encouraged fence row to fence row production and we structured our farm policy to bring about cheap prices for the consumer at home and abroad, that it was the American farmer who financed the entire deal out of his own assets and out of his own pocket.

Now today the stage is set with no strong worldwide demand. The dollar has strengthened to proportions that we are not familiar with. We do not know how to cope with basically putting a 30-percent tax on everything we try to export. We have licked inflation and that has sent land values plummeting. The debt load has become really an anchor. The question is finally before the only body, in my opinion, with the capacity to sustain and strengthen this Nation's agricultural structure.

What is of immediate concern is the need for short-term operating capital, and then certainly one must find a way to identify in this country those viable, capable producers who are in trouble not because of their own mismanagement but because of problems beyond their control. We must find a way to help them ride out this astronomical cycle that we are involved in. As a result, I am a cosponsor of H.R. 1035. There are other good bills around. And I hope that we will consider these strongly.

I would say, in closing, and thanking the gentleman for this time, that it is great to be here today and to see Members from both sides of the aisle here in a bipartisan effort to address the critical nature of the problems that are before us in agriculture today. I think what is at stake is unquestionably whether or not this country will have a hand in the future determination of who owns and controls and stewards this Nation's most valuable assets, its productive lands.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in behalf of the American farmer and the system of family farms that have provided this Nation with a reliable, economical, high quality food supply that is the envy of all the world. But I rise at possibly the most critical time in the history of American agriculture.

The headlines of the past few weeks have given me an eerie feeling of deja vu; 10,000 Minnesota farmers rallied in the freezing cold outside their State capital to protest the farm crisis. They made speeches, and they listened to speeches from the elected officials.

In Chicago, farmers were arrested when they surrounded the board of trade and the Mercantile Exchange to protest commodity trading practices and prices.

It took me back some 7 years ago when Lindsay Thomas, farmer, stood in the freezing winter weather that enveloped the Georgia State Capitol. I and thousands like me had come to make our voices heard in the urban center of our State.

And it took me back to the days a short time later when Lindsay Thomas hiked the Halls of Congress, doing and saying everything he could to work out a program to halt the destruction of the family farm.

That was a time when the trauma of agriculture was on the center stage of the public consciousness. Whether the image of the tractorcaid was good or bad, it brought the farm crisis thundering across the front page and the network news.

Well today, there are no headlines for the farmer in Washington.

No mention of the farmer in the President's inauguration speech.

No farmers walking the Halls of Congress.

There is only the silence of neglect.

But the irony is that the crisis of the family farm is far, far more serious today that when it made the national headlines 7 years ago.

By a curious combination of circumstances, this year is likely to be the most critical year of testing for the farmer and farm policy we have seen in decades.

First, the farm bill is expiring, and we will write and enact a new 4-year law that will govern our commodity programs, our export programs, our research and education programs through the Extension Service, our conservation programs, our farm credit programs, and other activities.

Second, in this crucial year of dealing with the budget deficit, agricultural programs are facing massive cuts and realignments. This competition in the budget priority list will come at a time when the political constituency for agriculture is at its weakest point in American history.

With the shift of population from the farm to the cities and suburbs, less than 3 percent of Americans now live on farms compared to 25 percent just 50 years ago.

Third, the family farmer and the agribusiness system that the farmer supports are in the darkest farm financing crisis to grip our country since the days of the Great Depression. If current trends are not reversed, many experts believe that one out of every three commercial farms in America today will be bankrupt or too far gone to save within 2 to 3 years.

And finally, the artificially strong U.S. dollar has shredded our ability to compete effectively in the world commodity markets. To make matters worse, we are in a temporary period in which the world markets and our own storage facilities are awash in a glut of commodities. And so the scenario is global. It is multifaceted and it has spread beyond the traditional parameters of agriculture as we have known it.

All these factors are coming together, right now, ready or not. There will be a collision of circumstances that will change our farming system for the good, for the bad, or for the disastrous. By the time the farm bill comes up for renewal in 1989, it is quite possible that the family farming system as we know it will be irreversibly on the road to extinction.

There are many policymakers in the executive branch today who would shed no tears for the family farm. Many actually believe the family farmer must inevitably fall victim to changing economic conditions.

Oh, I still believe that the majority of the Members of the Congress have some vague feeling that it would be nice to have family farms.

But in the hard, hot glare of political reality, those Congressmen and Congresswomen from urban and suburban America are now less inclined than ever before to vote for farm programs. They are hungry for budget-cutting votes that will not enrage their own constituents.

The shadow of the massive Federal debt and projection of continued mounting annual deficits will fall over the 1985 farm bill just as it will and must compel all legislation in this Congress. But the idea that we can find a disproportionate share of the saving in the agricultural sector while leaving many others to mount in cost is an approach that I will not support. The fact that economists like David Stockman must realize is that agriculture is our largest and most basic industry, and when it is totally devastated we will have literally knocked a cornerstone out from under our national economy. One whose loss will literally pull down our entire economic structure.

There are many like David Stockman who advocate basically gutting all Federal investment in agricultural and rural America. Their hit list looks like a who's who of programs that have aided development througout rural America.

Their cry is get the Government out of farming—let the market place rule—free trade. Market-oriented farm policy.

Well let me tell you they do it with total disregard to the fact that we are already faced with go broke prices/a world glut of commodities/an overvalued dollar that taxes all manufactured goods and agricultural export of 25 percent of the world markets. And they do it in total disregard to the fact that Federal policy directed and requested the overproduction that has resulted. They do it in total disregard to the fact that we made the credit easy while the surpluses mounted and while we lulled the consumer into thinking that this abundance of food products that the American finds in such quality and quantity and buys with less of the hourly earned wage than almost every other nation on the planet pays—that this is just some unlimited natural resource.

Truth is the farmer met the call of his nation to produce and he finances it and has literally subsidized it from his own assets.

And the cry for the free market comes in total disregard to the fact that America's agriculture assets are virtually depleted.

Let's look briefly at the last two decades and a half. In the 1960's the Federal Government phased out long-term programs of land diversion. In their place, the Federal strategy was to increase production to such a high level that even a modest profit margin could be multiplied into a livable wage.

So we invested in more land, pivot irrigation, the big tractors, the latest in mechanical technology, and the wonders of the new agri-chemicals. We told the American farmer to feed the world.

USDA, the White House, and the Congress preached the gospel of planting fence row to fence row. We turned to the Extension Service to teach us how to gear up for maximum production instead of optimum profits. We learned our production lessons well, and our agricultural exports jumped from $7 billion in 1970 to $43 billion in 1981.

By all appearances, America had become the agricultural giant of all time.

But behind the bold facade, the family farmer has being used up. His financial strength had been bled away to finance the investment needed to generate the massive production increases. Like a hospital patient weakened by disease, he had no financial strength left to pull him through hard times.

But the hard times came with a vengeance. Inflation soared. The Arab oil embargo threw our petro-dependent farms into a tailspin. Commodity prices flattened out and production costs went up off the charts.

Our Government and private lending institutions threw gasoline on the fire by coming to the rescue with more loans. Farm debt rose in Georgia from $1 billion in 1970 to $4.8 billion in 1983. The same thing happened in other States. The Government financed the debt partly because it wanted the grain exports to pay our Arab oil bills.

It was during the seventies under Presidents Nixon and Ford that we saw the first effects of probably the most shortsighted and unjust policy perpetrated on American agriculture—embargoes that shattered our credibility as a consistent and reliable supplier on the very world markets our Government had used our productive capacity to capture. Embargoes that drove other nations into competition against us to fill the void.

The last—hopefully the last—was imposed in 1980 by our own President from Georgia. Our exports in agriculture peaked the next year and have declined ever since. And 5 years later the Russians are still in Afghanistan.

And the only discernible effects have been the devastating blow dealt to our Nation's agriculture and agribusiness. Well, the patient is in intensive care now and the question arises should we care if the independent family farmer survives? Should we care who owns and stewards our lands?

Let me tell you what hangs in the balance.

The survival of our current structures of agriculture determines whether or not we have the stabilizing factor of diversified land ownership or whether the rapid consolidation of our most valuable asset continues.

Its survival determines whether our land ethic is that of the independent farmer who lives on, and loves his land, and nurtures it for future generations or whether the corporate motiff of the short-term profit replaces this land ethic. Our lands and seasons are more stable and productive than many of the oil-rich nations, the failure of our farm structure will afford further opportunity for the foreign owner, already a frightening phenomenon.

When we begin to look at world trends in population growth, the startling rate of desertification and loss of productive soils coupled with finite and steadily depleting supplies of fossil fuel bases, we begin to see an inevitable day when no one will question the value of our productive lands.

And what of our own State here in the Southeast, with prime land in reserve, and long growing seasons, and adequate water, while to the west the Ogalala, supplier of underground water for western agriculture rapidly reaches a point when agriculture usage will be halted.

Where will our lands be when the day arrives, as it certainly will, when we will need all we can produce.

Will it perhaps be planted all in timber and owned mostly by large conglomerates and even foreign corporations or worse still, paved over with asphalt and concrete.

That very crucial question will most likely be answered by what we do in Georgia and what we do in the Congress over the next 2 years.

I don't have to convince you—the best friends of agriculture we have in this State—that immediate action is needed. So my message is not one of conversion, but one in which I seek your counsel.

Let me share with you my idea. As I see it, we must save our best farmers from failure. When they go out of business, their skills are lost, and their land is threatened. When you lose the farmer, you lose the resource of a lifetime. And when you lose his farmland to nonfarm conversion, you have lost it all.

We are not going to save our best farmers with the old tools of Government policy. We are not going to be able to go to the Congress and the White House and secure the billions of dollars it would take to revive agriculture through direct support payments or paid diversions. We have our hands more than full simply fighting to preserve the programs we have now, much less enacting new ones.

Apart from those political realities, the truth is that our farm programs of support prices and loan rates are policy tools that are obsolete. They are almost half a century old.

Our commodity programs were conceived before the era of modern agriculture, modern transportation, modern trade barriers, modern foreign crop subsidies, modern population patterns and the blinding speed of modern commodity trading. They are the tools of a stone age called on to function in the era of star wars.

So what we do with those stone age tools when we revise the farm bill this year will be interesting and have some short-term significance. But the farm bill is not really relevant to the crisis that is killing American agriculture.

That crisis boils down to one thing—farm debt.

Our best farmers are going out of business because they cannot pay their bills with their current income. They must be given a fighting chance to hold on until help comes with the inevitable shift in commodity prices and the renewed world demand for American exports.

My plans is to develop formal criteria by which we will single out those farmers with a proven track record of first-class farming skills who also can demonstrate that given a chance, they can make a go of it. A top producer who is hopelessly overextended would not qualify for help.

Once we select those good farmers with a proven track record and a debt load that is realistically manageable, then we must consolidate his debt and give him a repayment plan that he can meet.

The key factor here is that I am talking about all debt—private commercial farm loans as well as loans from Farmers Home, SBA, and the Federal Land Bank. If we confine ourselves to Government institutions and not private lenders, we will be cutting out many of our best farmers. That is because many of our best farmers were not eligible for Farmers Home loans because they could still receive funds in the private credit markets.

Such a program will cost money because a refinancing package must involve some loan subsidy. We can seek to win the political fight to enact such a program in the Congress by combining our refinancing package with concessions in our basic support programs.

But in return, we ought to demand something more of our refinanced farmer than just his survival. We will require him to take his marginal land out of production and perhaps plant it in timber along the lines of the so-called pine tree bill that I and others supported last year.

Finally, we must combine this refinancing plan and soil stewardship plan with a whole new framework of Federal farm policy.

Let's throw away the stone age concept of seeing farm policy only in the context of commodity programs and agricultural research. Let's have a unified farm policy that encompasses our foreign trade policy.

The world markets are the battlegrounds where our farmers will survive or perish. How well they do in those world markets does not depend on their farming skills, it depends on the skills of our American trade negotiators. Let me remind you there is no more efficient producer than the American farmer.

It depends on whether we allow our agricultural exports to be trading chips in political foreign policy. When our European neighbors put on their military uniforms and transform themselves into our NATO allies, we give them billions of dollars and millions of our own soldiers to fortify their defense. When they climb into their pinstriped suits and become the leaders of the Common Market, we fall to our knees and beg for some small concession.

I am not saying that we threaten our European military allies with our defense dollars, but I am saying that we no longer negotiate our trade agreements in politically sealed compartments. We must look at our agricultural policy as part and parcel of our economic and foreign policy.

In closing, I would like to reiterate to you a few important points:

First, that the hope for survival of our farm structure as we know it lies within the capabilities of the Federal Government and its ability to coordinate agriculture policy on a national and global scale as an integral part of overall trade and economic policy. And that there is no hope without this help and assistance.

Second, that the credit problem is our most pressing area of concern, that failure to address it will do irreversible damage to our agricultural sector, our rural communities and in the end our national economy.

Third, that the main causes of our current crisis on the farm stems from issues really uncontrolled by the farmer or even our agricultural committees in Congress and yet the survival of our farmers depends directly upon how we respond in the scope of Federal policy.

How we gain fair access to work markets through trade policy and deal with tariff and nontariff barriers,

How we deal with the Federal deficit,

How we bring our currency into a more balanced relation with the currencies of foreign customers.

And finally whether or not we decide that the issue of who runs and controls our nations productive lands is as important as any other issue that affects the survival of this Republic.

Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DASCHLE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman for his statement and commend him for his yielding briefly.

Mr. Speaker, I come before you today as a representative of the Southern Tier of New York State where the farm debt crisis is alive and kicking. What I want to highlight most of all today is that this debt crisis is not unique to the Midwest. Farmers in upstate New York are suffering from similar problems to those in other areas of the country.

Last week, I had the opportunity to meet with 50 farmers in Allegany County to hear about the troubles they have experienced contending with the current downturn in the dairy industry as well as some difficulties in their dealings with the Farmers Home Administration. It was one of the most emotional gatherings I've ever experienced in 10 years in Congress. The farmers that I met were terribly concerned for the future of their farms and most of all, their ability to feed their own families. Some had already lost their farms and now had to accept food stamps and welfare payments to get by. These were not farmers who have been playing the tax shelter or corporate tax loophole game. These were small farmers who understand the real and true cost of production.

After my meeting with the farmers, I put together a list of their major concerns which I then presented to the local FmHA officers. While there was some difference between the farmers and the FmHA officials as to the details of specific problems, there was agreement on the fact that the total resources made available to solve these problems are not adequate. My farmers tell me that the eight farm bankruptcies which we have seen in Allegany County in the last year will be small compared to what will occur if drastic action is not taken.

We in New York State are not contributing to the nationwide dairy surplus problem. We consume more than we produce, and at this time are experiencing milk shortages. If we lose more dairy farms we may lose our cheese plants and other agribusinesses that are very important to the economy of our region and the country.

I believe it is particularly noteworthy that almost every one of the farmers with whom I met was under 40. These farmers are college graduates, they are efficient managers, and they keep very complete financial records. They are not in farming to get rich. They simply want to keep their farms and provide for their families. These young farmers did what the Government told them to do several years ago when they were first starting out. As a result, virtually all the younger farmers are now in difficulty and the Government wants to pull the rug out from under them.

In response to this crisis, I will be a problem solver first and foremost on the local level. My role will involve working out problems between the farmers and the local FmHA officials which hopefully will prevent future bankruptcies. My district staff is currently working with the farmers, to try to solve their individual problems with FmHA, and I plan to raise these problems in Allegany County to higher levels at FmHA as I believe that they deserve attention and solutions. Nonetheless, broader measures need to be developed here in Washington; all of the solutions cannot be found in Allegany County, NY.

If David Stockman thinks he can solve the problems of America's agricultural sector by abruptly cutting farm programs and suddenly initiating a "market oriented" farm policy approach, I wish he could have heard the woman from Fillmore, NY crying because she has not been able to buy food in 2 weeks, whose husband works from dawn until dusk, 7 days a week trying to save their farm. They both went to college and they did not buy their farm as a speculative real estate venture, thinking they were going to get rich. They now make $1,500 a month payments to FmHA. They don't have money for food, they are not on food stamps, and they have four children. In order to prevent future situations of this kind, I believe that our farm policies and the way in which we carry them out need to be changed radically and quickly.

Mr. Speaker, failure to take action immediately to constructively deal with the farm crisis will result in long term economic devastation in Allegany County and across rural America.

Mr. DASCHLE. I thank both the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. THOMAS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNDINE] for their contribution to this dialog.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OLIN].

Mr. OLIN. I thank the gentleman from South Dakota for yielding and I congratulate him for his leadership on this very important subject.

Mr. Speaker, I represent farmers in the western part of Virginia. Most of these are family farmers. Most of them are in diversified farming, in some combination of dairy, livestock; that is, sheep, hogs or beef, and poultry. All of these farmers are in a very tight situation, Mr. Speaker. Some have gone under, some are on the verge of going under. But most have been reasonably conservative and prudent in their planning of their investment on their farms. I do not think that the crisis that we hear of in other parts of the country is quite as severe in this area. But my farmers are very, very conscious of the fact that it is important for this Nation to keep the family farm structure, and they are willing to go a country mile, anything reasonable, to keep the kind of strength that this country has had in most of its past and still has of a predictable, stable, productive farm economy based principally on the family farm.

At the same time, these farmers are equally adamant that they are basically opposed to a general credit bailout and they feel, as I do, that credit assistance should be targeted principally at those struggling farmers who have a reasonable chance, with reasonable help, to get through this current credit crisis, and it must not be heaped upon those who may, for one reason or another, become so mired in debt that their survival is really unachievable.

Some farm economists are saying that we can handle this problem by categorizing farmers as to whether they are at an unacceptable debt-to-equity ratio. Some have suggested certain numbers. I do not know what the numbers are, but I think it is important that we find a reasonable, fair and practical way to determine how we are going to draw the line between those who get credit relief and those who do not.

Perhaps involvement in some reasonable way of the local credit organizations in the localities is the way to handle that. But I think it is important that we discriminate between those who are going to be able to make it and those who are not. We must remember that probably more than 40 percent of farmers in this Nation have little or no debt, and it is just not good economics to transfer that debt from those who have been prudent to those who, for one reason or another, whether their fault or not, are overextended and are really insolvent.

There comes a time—we all know this—when you just cannot borrow yourself out of debt.

Mr. Speaker, the problems of our agriculture are far more severe than a dose of emergency credit can cure. I would hope that, while we are looking at this farm credit crisis, we take prompt action on it and in a selective way we provide the bridge that we are going to need to have a healthy farm economy, but that we do that as a temporary immediate measure and then get on with the real task beyond that, which is to get a reasonable farm bill that gets at some of the basic problems, and get at the Federal deficit which probably more than any other single factor would help the farmers of this Nation.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. DASCHLE. I thank the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUCKABY].

Mr. HUCKABY. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I commend him for taking this special order. It is certainly appropriate to do this.

Mr. Speaker, in the late seventies and early eighties, we looked around us and we saw our domestic shoe industry, our steel industry, our electronic industry, so many different, varied industries in the United States, getting in trouble, and we always thought we would always have agriculture to fall back on. With our system of family farms, our rich fertile land, no one could compete with American agriculture. And here, today, in 1985, we see ourselves faced with the same situation in agriculture. Why? How did it happen?

I think two reasons contributed to this. One is the very strong American dollar. What does that mean? Let me give you an example. In 1981, a $6 bushel of soybeans cost 10.1 marks in Germany, if you were wanting to import soybeans in Germany from the United States. Today that same $6 bushel of soybeans cost 18.1 marks, an 80 percent increase.

The American farmer is still getting $6 for that bushel of soybeans, even less, actually, today, yet the German is having to pay 80 percent more for that same bushel of soybeans. That is the hidden tax of what these massive deficits have done for all of America's exports, including agriculture.

Dave Stockman says he needs to reduce the deficits—and we all agree with that. And his proposed farm bill will reduce price supports, commodity supports, from an expenditure of $15 to $5 billion, he will phase down over the next 3 years some $10 billion in savings. That is less than one-third of the increase that this administration is proposing for defense in this year alone.

I think we have our priorities wrong.

The other area that has hurt American agriculture is unfair competition from abroad. The European Common Market subsidizes to the tune of $20 billion a year their farmers. The French sugar farmer receives more money for his sugar than the American sugar farmer, and yet the French turn around and dump their surpluses abroad at prices that our farmers cannot compete with.

This administration is calling for a market-oriented farm bill, a free-market farm bill. The only problem is that a free market does not exist in agriculture.

Japan, which exports so much to us, they support rice at six times the price of ours, six times the price of the American rice farmer, and we cannot sell rice to Japan.

It is time we stood up and got tough in the export markets, and that is one of the things this Congress needs to do in the new farm bill.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DASCHLE. I thank the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKART].

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. I appreciate the gentleman's efforts here today.

Mr. Speaker, fortunately, there has been some good news from the economic front in the last several months. Inflation is at a tolerable level, increases in unemployment have abated, manufacturers are again reporting healthy profits. However, the good news has yet to reach our Nation's struggling farmers.

Although Federal farm aid reached an alltime high last year of $22.5 billion, a record number of farmers entered into bankruptcy last year. There are over 2 million farmers in the United States and economists estimate that nearly a third of them are sliding toward insolvency and that some 12 percent of them will hang up "out of business" signs this year. Like the Central and South American debt crisis of a few years ago, this financial crisis also threatens our fragile finance system. Last year 25 banks who deal primarily in agricultural lending failed and that number is expected to increase this year.

Our Nation's agriculture is one of the greatest success stories of Government assistance. Since the Great Depression, our Nation's farmers, with the help of the Federal Government, have become the most efficient and innovative food producers in the world.

But, our trophy as the world's breadbasket now is in jeopardy.

The problems of our farmers are many. They have been victimized by the overvalued dollar. With the record Federal budget deficit propping up interest rates and the dollar's value, our farmers have not been able to compete in export markets which are essential to a successful agriculture program. It is imperative that we do whatever is necessary to reduce the current $200 billion deficits.

As we have all come to see, reducing the deficit is no easy task. We are especially aware that the deficit and, consequently, interest rates, are not going to decrease overnight, but our farmers' financial situations are worsening every night. We have to take steps to save our farmers immediately.

I strongly support the Farm Emergency Credit Act of 1985. As my colleagues before me have pointed out, this bill offers immediate help to those who need it most. Unlike the administration's offers, this bill is a more complete answer to the immediate need of our farmers.

A farmer in my district, like many of his neighbors, is experiencing financial distress. Last June he was approved for an FmHA emergency loan. However, no money was found for the approved loans. FmHA then said October, but no money ever came. Then they said January, no money. February, no money. Now they claim that the money will come in mid-March. Who knows. In the meantime, the creditors' patience is wearing as thin as my farmer friend's finances.

Action is needed and it's needed now. We need a strong and stable supply of food. We don't need to keep sending food growers to the food lines.

Dwight Eisenhower said almost 30 years ago some very prophetic words. "Farming looks mighty easy when your plow is a pencil and you're a thousand miles from the cornfield."

This administration is a thousand miles from the cornfield and its up to Congress to rein them in and restore reality to the economics and way of life of farming.

Our farmers don't want a handout or a dole. All they want is a fair shake and an opportunity. We owe them at least that much.

Mr. DASCHLE. I yield to our deputy whip and a member of the Appropriations Committee, who has been very involved in this issue, my friend, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I thank him for his leadership. I especially compliment his efforts in drafting and forging the emergency legislation to meet the urgent credit crisis that is to be marked up this week in Congress in a fast-track method in an attempt to meet the credit needs of the American farmer. It is a vital bill. It is needed at this time. I compliment the gentleman's leadership and the effort he has put forth in bringing our immediate attention to this national problem.

A minute ago someone mentioned that there should not be finger pointing on this issue that we address today on the national credit crisis in agriculture, and I certainly agree. Just the other day, in Jonesboro, AR. I attended a meeting of over 1,000 farmers. Farmers are interested in results and not much debate, but we in the Congress must debate these issues before we can produce results.

But this one lady from Lee County, AR, came to me and said, "Congressman, why don't you stop arguing with one another in Washington; put politics aside, and try to resolve the issue that faces the American farmer." As I have listened to the debate today from both sides of the aisle, both Republican and Democrat, I think we can say there is a bipartisan consensus here today. Every speaker I have heard thus far is apparently convinced the administration's farm policy is one that prevents farmers from making a profit. That policy has accumulated over the last several years to a point of crisis.

Mr. Speaker, we are a nation born of the land. During the early years it was the rural life and frontier spirit that nourished the ideas of democracy in America. Thomas Jefferson praised the farmer when he said, "Cultivators of the earth are the most valuable citizens. They are the most vigorous, the most independent, the most virtuous, and they are tied to their country and wedded to its liberty and interests by the most lasting bonds."

We are a nation sustained by the land. Agriculture is clearly our Nation's largest industry. As of January 1, 1984, farm assets were equal to about 70 percent of the capital assets of all manufacturing corporations in the United States according to the 1985 Fact Book of U.S. Agriculture.

Where only 3 million people work on the farm today, that's as many as the combined work force of transportation, the steel industry, and the automobile industry. A total of 22.5 million people work in some phase of agriculture making this industry the Nation's largest employer. Our agriculture system also accounted for nearly 20 percent of the gross national product for 1982. More Americans are involved in agriculture than we realize because farm purchases play an important part in America's economy.

In 1983 farmers spent $9.8 billion for tractors and other motor vehicles, machinery, and equipment. It took 150,000 employees to produce all this farm equipment.

Farmers spent nearly $16 billion for fuel, lubricants, and maintenance for their machinery and vehicles. Farming uses more petroleum than any other single industry in the Nation.

Farmers also purchased 360 million pounds of rubber—enough to put tires on nearly 7 million automobiles.

Farmers used more than 33 billion kilowatt-hours of electricity—more than the annual residential use in all New England States plus Maryland, Kentucky, and Washington, DC.

The use of steel in farming accounts for 40,000 jobs within the steel industry.

American agricultural production is based on the presumption of exports. During the 1970's U.S. agricultural exports grew at the extraordinary rate of 20 percent a year. Two of every 5 acres of production must find sales in the export market to provide one-quarter of the gross farm income. Thus, nearly half of all that we produce is for export markets. However, U.S. grain exports began to drop off sharply in 1981. By the end of 1983 total U.S. grain exports were 27.8 million metric tons less than they would have been had the trend of the 1970's continued.

There is a crisis on the American farm today—the worst since the Great Depression some analysts believe. "Not since the 1930's has financial stress gripped the agricultural community so tenaciously, says the February 1, 1985, Agricultural Situation Report of the Farmers Credit Association. Indeed, many knowledgable people feel the American farmer is already in the midst of another great depression.

The American farmer has dedicated his life to feeding and clothing the world. Today, he's asking for help in order that he might be able to properly feed and clothe himself and his family.

Between 1979 and 1983 net farm income in the United States decreased 50 percent.

Farm residents in 1983 received, after taxes, an average per capita income of $6,917—considerably less than the $10,057 of capita income for nonfarm residents.

Dire warnings about the precarious financial state of agriculture abound:

If positive steps are not taken soon to resolve the current financial crisis in agriculture, the Farm Credit Administration reports, the costs to society in terms of wealth reduction, business failures, and social unrest will be huge.

And yet, despite these warnings, I'm not sure the Reagan administration really understands what we are facing today. It seems that the more the administration gets its way, the worse it gets.

In last Thursday's Washington Post, David Stockman, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, was asked whether the administration thinks there is a "national interest" in small farmers.

"What's the small farmer," he responded, "that's a sociological concept."

Mr. Stockman presents quite a contrast to Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Webster. For a former history major from the Michigan State University, he seems to have skipped too many history classes, not to mention sociology classes. The thing Mr. Stockman doesn't realize is that there are nearly 1.5 million of these "sociological concepts" in our country who produce less than $20,000 worth of farm commodities. That's not a concept. That's a reality.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture reports that approximately 18 percent of all farm operators have a debt/asset ratio of 40 percent or more. When the debt/asset ratio reaches 40 percent, economists will say interest costs of the farmer begin to threaten his survival. What these percentages translate into is 419,000 financially stressed farmers with $109 billion in debt as of last January.

But even more important is the fact that there are 156,000 farms with debt/asset ratios of 70 percent or more, representing $46 billion in debt and $28 billion in assets. This sort of situation is highly insolvent and indicates a near-term potential loss exposure facing lenders.

It is worth repeating the Farm Credit Administration's predictions concerning this point:

> Unless the financial situation in agriculture is stabilized there is a danger that asset values will be forced unduly low because of forced sales. Highly stressed operators, for example, hold about 3 percent of the total assets in agriculture, considerably more than what normally comes on the market in a given year. If the bulk of these farmers go out of business in the coming year, asset markets will be under strong downward pressure.

Alan R. Tubbs, on behalf of the American Bankers Association, gave this testimony before the Subcommittee on Conservation, Credit and Rural Development on February 7, 1985:

> Based on the agricultural credit and farm debt situation, I see an impending and unavoidable crisis for this year, next year, and possibly beyond as these highly leveraged farmers hit a point of no return.
> My concern is that as these operators are pushed into bankruptcy, foreclosure, or partial liquidation, it will force the reallocation of assets, further eroding asset values and creating a downward spiral.

You can see this beginning to happen all over the country. As land values decrease, farmers are unable to borrow money for their production needs. Without production, they are unable to pay back their current loans. As many are forced to sell land in order to meet loan payments or raise money to plant, they push the prices of neighboring farmland down. Mr. Tubbs pointed out that in the last 2 to 3 years the average land reduction in the Midwest has been approximately 30-40 percent. We are becoming ensnarled in a vicious vortex.

But, our gravest problem in agriculture is our reliance on export markets which we are losing because of the overvalued dollar. It seems the Reagan administration favors an economic policy which encourages imports but which discourages exports.

Our trade deficit has quadrupled under the Reagan administration. From $25.5 billion under Carter it has grown to $107 billion under Reagan. Estimates for the 1985 fiscal year are that the trade deficit will be $123.0 billion and possibly more than $150.0 billion in fiscal year 1986.

Of course, agriculture is not our only export, but it is a most important one. The overvalued dollar makes it very difficult for the American farmer to compete with other countries in foreign agriculture markets. Other countries, using government subsidies, are able to market their goods at prices well below ours.

The artificially inflated dollar and the growth in the trade deficit has contributed directly to the historically high interest rates we are now experiencing. Real interest rates have shot up astronomically under President Reagan. From a low of 2.9 percent in 1980, real interest rates stood at 8.04 percent at the end of 1984.

These high real interest rates have helped carry total farm debt to all-time records. Real estate debt has grown from $49.6 billion in 1976 to $110 billion in 1983. The total farm debt for real estate and non-real estate, excluding Commodity Credit Corporation loans, has grown from $91.1 billion in 1976 to well over $200 billion in 1983. It should be pointed out that $109 billion of this current debt is held by 18 percent—or 419,000—of our farmers, something I alluded to earlier.

Despite all of his talk about freezing the budget, Mr. Reagan is proposing to do no such thing. He proposes to increase defense spending by 12.5 percent while cutting major domestic programs by 13 percent. Included in that 13 percent figure for domestic cuts is $7.5 billion which will be taken out of agriculture programs.

I'm not sure that we can afford to cut our agriculture expenditures at this time. At best, we may be able to freeze the expenditures, but I don't think the farm economy can handle the shock of having the floor cut out from under it. Moreover, these proposals come at the worst possible time for farmers. Declining exports, rising debt, falling land prices, and depressed crop prices have already placed many farmers on the brink of bankruptcy.

So, what is the solution?

As a near-term solution for the current crisis, I would urge support for the passage of the Emergency Farm Credit Act of 1985 which I have cosponsored with the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE]. This would allow farmers the necessary funds to plant their 1985 crops.

But most important, we need to find long-term solutions to bring down real interest rates and to restore a true value to the American dollar.

As a novel idea, John F. Twist, a constituent of mine, has advanced the proposal of creating a national food bank. This idea and others must be explored by Congress.

Meanwhile, we must enact the Emergency Credit Act to permit farmers to stay in business until Congress can provide an alternative to the current policies.

Mr. DASCHLE. I thank the gentleman for his excellent remarks.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY].

Mr. MCCURDY. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I think by the comments from the Members that were present here today and also the recent reports in the media across this Nation and in the meetings that many of us had in our districts over the last break, that there is indeed a crisis in agriculture in America. I have yet to hear anyone dispute the fact that there is a problem. But where the line has been drawn is "What is the solution; where are the answers?"

This is a crisis that affects all of us, not just the people in the Fourth Congressional District of Oklahoma that I represent. If affects the retailers nationwide. It affects the banks. It affects the suppliers. It affects the manufacturers. It affects everyone who is involved in eating, because if you eat, you are involved in agriculture.

Even though I strongly disagree with her son's remarks the other day, our Budget Director, I have to agree with David Stockman's mother when she said "I can't understand what he is saying, because without some immediate relief, there are not going to be any young farmers to take the old one's places. There is not going to be anyone to inherit the farm."

It is true, in my district I met with young people who were facing bankruptcy, and I met with old people. I met with new farmers and established farmers. The answer is the same: They are in deep, deep trouble. They have been faced with falling land values; market prices that have not increased in years; the overvalued dollar overseas; rising interest rates; diminishing overseas markets; stronger, better-subsidized foreign competition. Yet the answers that we receive from the administration, the Secretary of Agriculture, is: "We will have free trade; the free market system will take care of it."

Mr. Speaker, there is no such thing as free trade in agriculture. There is no free market when you are dealing with the subsidies from overseas. What is the answer? The farm bill will address many of the long-term concerns of agriculture. But, that is a long way from being enacted. We need a short-term solution, and I think the gentleman from South Dakota is on the right track. We need a short-term, immediate credit program to help the American farmer.

Now the farmers in my district, we had a meeting the other evening in a small town called Frederick, OK. We had over 500 farmers at that meeting. They filled the auditorium; they were out in the hall. They were waiting to get in. They could not find enough seats. The farmers got together through a committee and they came forward with some proposals. Not just talking about the problem, but they came up with some suggestions, some alternative solutions. One of the programs that they recommended is the need for short-term credit available to those that can demonstrate they can "cash flow." In other words, they can demonstrate that they can make it with some additional time and some additional help.

It is true, we are going to lose a lot of farmers in the short term. We cannot afford to continue to lose them at the rate that we are. We have to react and to assist them immediately. A retailer spoke the other evening, a young woman, and she said, "You know, it appears today that in America small is out. Small is out." You know, she is really right; small is out. If you are Chrysler Corp. and you are failing, and my friends from Michigan are behind me here, the American Government responds; we help. If you are New York City and you are failing, the American Government responds and we help. If you are the Continental Illinois Bank in Chicago and you are failing, the Federal Government responds.

We have had banks fail in my district by the handfuls this year and we are not reacting; the Federal Government is not helping. We have farmers that are going under every day and we have not helped. Small is out. I think it is incumbent upon the Congress of the United States to stand up for the small American farmer and do what is right. I think we have to act quickly, and I commend the gentleman from South Dakota for his efforts, and my colleagues from across the country from coast to coast who have responded and are speaking out and intend to act for the most vital sector of our entire economy, and that is American agriculture.

Mr. DASCHLE. I thank the gentleman for his excellent statement.

Mr. Speaker, I yield at this time to one of the more active Members in the House and a distinguished Member, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ROWLAND].

Mr. ROWLAND of Georgia. I thank the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the gentleman for the initiative that he has taken in focusing attention on this crisis that we face in our country today.

Mr. Speaker, after a series of town hall meetings for farmers during the recess, I am here today to plead the case for my farmers. I know that many of my colleagues also met with farmers in their respective districts, and I am pleased that we can join together in helping make others aware of the seriousness of the crisis that faces rural America, and eventually the entire country.

To my colleagues, I wish to pass along a statement of one of my farmers, "We feel that we have to fight a government that's blind to the problems that we face in agriculture. We feel that Washington only gives lip services to our problems." Now I dare say, that none of us here today want to say that we are blind to the situation.

I know that if each of you had the opportunity to listen to farmers, then you, too, realize that their testimony is from experience and experience is the truth. Farming is not just a business, it is a way of life. It goes beyond the tangible aspects of yields and profits, it involves dignity and pride. Farmers are a dedicated group of individuals, committing their lives to long hours and hard work.

At one time, the situation was that farmers were able to hang on, but today it is just not the case. Farmers are losing, and when agriculture loses, the whole economy of the Nation loses. Our farmers are not asking for handouts, they are only asking for help to continue producing food for America. What concerns me is that we have the capacity to produce for the world, but we cannot keep the food producers in business. Does it seem to be an impossible task to help our farmers? If we take away the incentive and pride of being a farmer, then we are taking away the American pioneer spirit. People outside the agricultural community must realize that this problem is not going away, it is only going to get worse, if we do not do something about it. We cannot take a leave of absence from helping our farmers. I think that we must give our farmers a chance to remain in farming.

My district is three-fourths agriculture; therefore, I feel the testimony from my farm forums are highly representative of the problems in our country and especially the Southeastern area. Many of the problems raised during these forums pointed to our regional location which has different planting seasons, and with some areas producing better yields than others. Right now, my farmers are preparing to plant, and you cannot say the same for all areas of the country. The dairy issue is also a point to raise here because our market is primarily class I fluid milk which is not causing the present dairy surplus. Since this is a recurring issue within my area, I feel some attention needs to be focused on a regionalized farm plan.

Farmers need a fair price for their product. As one farmer stated, "No matter what Federal plan we have, we have got to have a fair price." A lack of profit is a problem in agriculture. Farmers continue to see an increase in the cost of production, but that's about it. The current system is not working for agriculture, and we must make some changes now.

I heard from other members of the rural community besides the producer of food. Rural community leaders pointed out that if farmers go, they also go. Agribusinessmen know if the farmer cannot buy a tractor then they cannot sell a tractor. A packager of commodities in my district pointed out if they cannot sell the products for exports, then they cannot package the products; thus, their plant hurts. The ripple effects of the current farm crisis reach out to the entire community, even to the point, as one farmer mentioned that insurance companies are denying insurance coverage for farmers' homes due to the high risks.

Now, I could go on and on with information that was brought to my attention during the recess. However, I will have this specific material to share with you in the very near future. Today, I challenge the Congress to start taking some action to restore agriculture, not only for the livelihood for our farmers, but for all of America as well.

Mr. DASCHLE. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas has graciously conceded to allow us to bring up the special order of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] ahead of his. We have made the agreement that we will only use 15 minutes of that special order so that he can proceed with his, so we have some additional time.

In light of that, I ask everyone for a certain amount of brevity, and also yield to a very dear friend, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN], who took time out of his busy schedule last week to come to South Dakota to listen to farmers directly, and he was very warmly received out there. I want to publicly thank him at this time for that commitment and for his interest in this issue.

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I would like very much to thank the gentleman from South Dakota for his hospitality.

Mr. Speaker, let me, in a couple of minutes, at least begin to etch out why it seems to me that this is a farm crisis, but it is more than a crisis among farmers, and there is a good reason for people throughout the country to take an interest. As far as I can determine, there is one full-scale farm in the 17th District where I come from. Perhaps there is more to an area somewhat suburban where there used to be many farms.

Why am I interested? First of all, I come from a State that has a great deal of agriculture, and that is true of most industrial States. There is a strong agricultural sector as well as a strong industrial sector, side by side.

Second, the country is growing smaller. There is an inter-dependence, so when farmers go broke, they do not buy equipment that is made by workers in cities and towns.

There is another reason, and that is the causes of stress in rural America are common, indeed have also helped to bring about hardship, in nonrural America, for example the overvalued dollar. As has been mentioned, it is hurting the farmer and the auto worker, the farmer and the steel worker, the farmer and the tool and die worker and, yes, even the farmer and the high-tech worker.

There is a second cause: High interest rates. Historic real interest rates are harming the farmer and the construction worker.

So, Mr. Speaker, these chickens that I have mentioned, high real interest rates and also the over-valued dollar, are coming home to roost in rural and nonrural America.

I want to mention another reason, if I might, and that is, a common theme is being sung by some about distress, which is real distress in rural America and nonrural America. Dave Stockman said a few weeks ago that he saw no reason to distinguish among the laid-off industrial worker, the troubled small business person or the aging veteran of World War II or the student whose loan would be ended and the distressed farmer.

In a word, we are in a common boat, that is true, but his conclusion is that the boat should drift, if not sink, in the waters of icy indifference. It seems to me that is not the answer. I do not want to excuse mistakes made by farmers, but they were not all land speculators, and I do not want to forget for a moment the deficit, that farmers were not the only cause of the deficit in this country. I do not want to put the family farmer on a pedestal, but there is a lot of talk, and correctly so, about values in American society, and it seems to me we ought to look at the values involved in the family farm.

I do not want to cave in for a moment to selfish interests in this country, but all self-interest should not be dismissed simply as selfish interests.

Lastly, I do not want to be for a moment a rubber stamp for all the subsidies in this country for farmers or anybody else.

I am not sure of the answer to the farm problem in the long run, but I am sure that the answer is not to let tens of thousands of middle-sized farmers sink in the short run. So I congratulate the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE] for his initiative. It is of importance to all of us, whether there are farms in our districts or whether there are not. I not only thank the gentleman for his hospitality but urge that he carry on. I intend to support his efforts to see that in the short run farms do not sink because of the lack of credit by the tens of thousands.

Mr. DASCHLE. I thank the gentleman for his excellent remarks, and I hope that people in rural areas can be as responsive to the urban needs as the gentleman has to us.

Mr. Speaker, today, the Congress resumes its business for the 99th Congress. There will be many critical and timely items on the agenda of this body. The budget, tax simplification, education, defense spending, and health care issues to mention but a few.

My colleagues and I take this floor today to tell you that one problem stands far above all others needing the immediate attention of this body. That problem, Mr. Speaker, is the agricultural credit crisis that is sweeping through the Farm Belt of this country, and which has engulfed my State of South Dakota. A credit crisis that will force hundreds of thousands of small, family farmers from their farms, and will cause others uncertainty as to whether they can obtain the necessary financing for their spring planting.

As this congressional session resumes, many of us are returning to this Chamber having spent a number of days in our district, listening to the concerns our constituents. Many of us held meetings to hear specifically from our farm and ranch constituents. We have heard first-hand comments from generation family farmers and ranchers who are watching the demise of their farming operation. We have watched grown men and women weep openly trying to express the frustration they feel about losing a part of their family to an adverse situation largely beyond their control.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I take the floor of the House of Representatives today for one purpose, to continue the bipartisan efforts of Members from throughout the Farm Belt to draw the Nation's attention to the magnitude of this problem, and propose immediate solutions.

In part, solutions must come from all involved in this crisis, from the administration, from the Congress, the financial community, and the farmers themselves. If there is a positive observation that can be made of the pronouncements from this administration, specifically John Block and David Stockman, regarding solutions to this crisis is that they are consistent. Consistent in their plans to allow for the further demise of the family farm operation, clearing the way for corporate farming operations and large land barons. Consistent in their attempts to lay the current farm crisis solely in the laps of those deserving the least blame, the family farmers and ranchers who responded to Government policies advocating fence-row-to-fence-row production. Consistent in ignoring the role played by this administration in the decline of our export markets and the exorbitant level of interest rates our farmers and ranchers must accept.

At a time when thousands of family farmers are being driven from the land, where is the administration? Where is the farmers' advocate in Washington, the Department of Agriculture? One need only to look at the administration's fiscal year 1986 budget to see continuation of this consistent farm policy. David Stockman and John Block's fingerprints cover this proposed agricultural budget, a set of priorities that rewards the Pentagon's $500 hammer and $200 toilet seat performance with a 13-percent spending level increase, and leaves the farmers and ranchers reeling from a budget that:

Reduces income support target prices from 100 percent to 75 percent by 1991.

Reduces price support loans to a level of 75 percent of the average market price during the previous 3 years.

Eliminates acreage reduction, paid diversion, and payment-in-kind programs.

Eliminates all direct farm lending for ownership and operating purposes, including the Limited Resource—young farmer—Program.

Eliminates direct Federal export loans, and establish a 5-percent fee for guaranteed agricultural credit programs.

Phases out the Rural Electrification Administration.

Proposes $300 million in cuts by terminating or curtailing the Soil Conservation Service, the ASCS, the Extension Service, and the Animal and Plant Inspection Service.

With this budget, Mr. Speaker, David Stockman and John Block's action are clear. They are asking the minority of the population—that are farmers and ranchers—to absorb disproportionate amounts of their budget cuts. The bottom line result? The Pentagon spending spree continues and the budget deficit, with excessive interest rates, remains at record levels.

In his litany of attacks against the family farmers and ranchers of the Nation, David Stockman was quoted as describing farmers "as one group that has the last claim on the budget. The one group that had the greatest budget access in the last 5 years—$60 billion in farm subsidies in the last 5 years * * *." Consistency is the name of his game. He conveniently forgets to tell the American public that majority of that 5-year subsidy was his administration's own PIK Program, a hasty and scattered failure whose most notable success was the beneficiaries who reaped the million dollar PIK payments because John Block chose to lift the benefit limits which had applied to all previous programs.

And then we have the President's own pronouncement regarding the reason he no longer has cattle on his California ranch. His response: Because it is a hobby ranch, he would no longer get a Federal tax break for doing so. Mr. Speaker, there are many ranchers and farmers in my State of South Dakota who would welcome the opportunity to pay Federal income tax, because it would mean they realized an income.

With David Stockman at the budget helm, it is clear that recognition of this crisis will have to come from this body. I want to commend the leadership of the Agriculture Committee, Chairman DE LA GARZA as well as the chairman of the Conservation and Credit Subcommittee, ED JONES, for taking the lead in advancing emergency credit legislation. The leadership of the House has given its assurances that emergency agricultural credit legislation will be brought to the floor of this body as soon as possible to allow for financing in advance of spring planting. I want to assure you the farmers know who is helping during this crisis and who is not.

A number of my colleagues have joined me in introducing H.R. 1035, the Farm Emergency Credit Act of 1985, a summary of which includes:

SUMMARY OF H.R. 1035, THE FARM EMERGENCY CREDIT ACT OF 1985

SECTION 1: ADVANCE COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION LOANS

Advance price support loans will be made available to producers of 1985 crops. These loans will be made available to producers who participate in the 1985 farm program, with a maximum of 50 percent of the producer's 1985 crop eligible for advance CCC price support loans.

Eligible crops shall include those crops for which price suport loans are available as specified in the 1949 food and agriculture act.

These loans shall be recourse loans as long as the crop remains unharvested. Upon harvest, and certification that the crop is available as collateral for the loan, the status shall change to non-recourse.

The interest rate on the advance support loans would be set at normal CCC interest rate levels.

The advance loan program would be administered by the ASCS and ASC county committees.

SECTION 2: DEBT RESTRUCTURING

The current administration loan guarantee (debt adjustment) program would be revised as follows:

A 90 percent guarantee will be available on loans provided through the farm credit system and commercial lenders.

The FmHA's cash flow requirement would be reduced from 110 percent to 100 percent. (This would apply to the FmHA debt setaside program, as well as new loans.)

Lender would be required to establish interest rates on the loan at a level of not more than 2½ points above the Federal Reserve's discount rate.

Program would be available for debt restructuring as well as current operating expenses.

SECTION 3: ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

USDA will be instructed to use all possible avenues available to the Department to facilitate the administration of this program.

Loan guarantee authority will be increased to $3 billion.

Legislation requires the USDA to have both the advance price support program, and the debt restructuring program available within 15 days of enactment of the legislation.

Within 30 days of application, FmHA must approve or reject the lending institutions' application for participation in the "approved lender" program, in order for the institution to provide immediate credit assistance.

Mr. Speaker, this concept of emergency credit is just that: a temporary and emergency response to a critical problem. Without this proposal, hundreds of thousands of family farmers and ranchers from throughout the Midwest will be denied the necessary credit to plant their spring crop, and thus, will be forced to sell their property on a value declining market.

The long range problem must be addressed through this body's consideration of the 1985 farm bill. We must address the problem of low farm prices, the problem of unrestricted payments to giant conglomerate farm operators, the problem of a declining export market. Some might ask, why not wait until the farm bill? Mr. Speaker, for many that will be weeks too late.

David Stockman has asked "What is a small farmer?" A letter I received from a small dairy farmer in McCook County, SD would answer that question for the budget director:

My dad told me 12 years ago that you'll make money farming if you are honest, work hard, and use your money wisely. I believed him then, and I believe him yet, but I'm having trouble making my wife and three boys believe it. As yet they have seen no real prosperity.

We milk between 80 and 90 holstein cows, 7 days a week, 365 days a year, care for all of the young stock and farm approximately 800 acres of land. We get up at 4:30 and go to bed at 10:00, we go to church on Sunday. We liked what we're doing, we feel that we are competitive and efficient, and would like to think because of our ambition and determination, we might have a future here. We have never taken a vacation . . . We lived on $32 in February of 1984.

Mr. Stockman, this "small farmer" is currently trying to work with the Farmers Home Administration so that he can keep at least 320 acres of his land, and refinance his 15 percent bank loan to a more manageable level.

Mr. Stockman, he is not much different than the Platte, SD farmer who attended one of my farm meetings this past week. This man is in his fifties and has his land totally paid for. He isn't the land speculator you have been pointing to in your public statements. Yet, low farm prices, high interest rates and declining export markets teamed up to allow him a $2,000 income during this past year. He asked me "Why does Mr. Stockman make such broad comments about farmers? I think I am an established farmer, and yet I am losing money?

Mr. Speaker, I hope these two men have a chance to meet soon. Before it's too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE] has expired.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Alexander special order be taken up out of order and that it be reduced to 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

DIFFICULTIES FACING AMERICAN AGRICULTURE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thank the Speaker. Mr. Speaker, during the past week, the House Budget Committee conducted field hearings around the country on the impact of the deficit crisis facing this country. Our colleague, HOWARD WOLPE of Michigan, recently chaired one of these hearings in Lansing, MI, on the issue of "Budget, Deficits, and American Agriculture."

The gentleman from Michigan is highly regarded by the Members of this body for his legislative skill and knowledge of Federal spending issues. With this in mind, I commend to my colleagues the comments offered by the gentleman at the opening of the Lansing hearing.

OPENING STATEMENT OF REP. HOWARD WOLPE, HOUSE BUDGET COMMITTEE FIELD HEARING ON THE BUDGET, DEFICITS, AND AMERICAN AGRICULTURE—LANSING, MI, FEB. 11, 1985

I would like to begin by welcoming the distinguished witnesses who will appear before the House Budget Committee today, and all of those in attendance in the audience. Today's hearing is the second in a series that the committee is conducting to obtain the views of the American people on the deficit crisis that is facing our Nation, and on the best means of tackling this serious problem.

Today's hearing will focus, in particular, upon the Federal Government's agriculture budget. We will receive testimony from a diverse group of witnesses including agricultural economists, farmers, bankers, and representatives of agricultural organizations.

It is difficult to overstate the tremendous danger posed by massive Federal budget deficits. I say this, knowing full well that when this all-too-familiar warning is pronounced, the typical reaction is for the eyes of half the audience to glaze over, while the other half falls asleep.

I certainly don't blame the audience for this reaction. I think any blame probably lies with many of us in Congress who have been running around like Chicken Little declaring that the sky was going to fall if we didn't get these huge deficits under control.

We all know that the sky hasn't fallen. In fact, the Nation has been experiencing a rather strong recovery that is—ironically—in a large part due to the tremendous economic stimulus provided by such massive deficit spending.

No, the sky hasn't fallen. But that doesn't mean that all is well. Although must less dramatic, I submit that these huge deficits are like an insidious poison in our economic bloodstream that is quietly taking its toll.

This point was made last Friday by Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker in an appearance before the Senate Budget Committee. Mr. Volcker observed that many people may have been lulled into believing that these large deficits are not harmful because the economy has remained strong since the recession ended 2 years ago.

But Mr. Volcker emphasized that these huge deficits have already hurt farmers, steelworkers, and all other industries that export or compete with imports.

It is not difficult to document the relationship between these troubled industries and massive Federal budget deficits. I would begin by drawing your attention to the chart entitled "Historical Deficits."

As the chart graphically illustrates, we have experienced Federal deficits of an unprecedented magnitude in the past few years. Moreover, in President Reagan's proposed 1986 budget, we would still have Federal deficits that will total $489 billion over the next 3 years.

In fact, the overall national debt is growing at a faster rate than the economy itself. The administration's budget document reports that the gross Federal debt at the end of 1980 was $914 billion, and by the end of this year it will have doubled to $1.8 trillion. And the Congressional Budget Office estimates that if we continue with current policies, by the end of the decade it would triple to $2.5 trillion.

The Federal Government's demand for credit to finance these recent deficits has accelerated much faster than the growth of the Nation's net savings. As our next chart shows, the massive Government borrowing has put pressure on the credit markets, thereby pushing real interest rates to record levels.

These high U.S. real interest rates have, in turn, attracted large inflows of foreign capital. The resulting increase in demand for the dollar has sharply pushed up its value. It is as if we are imposing a 37 percent tax on all of the farm and manufactured goods we want to sell overseas, while providing a 37 percent subsidy on all imported goods.

The super-strong dollar is great if you can afford to fly to Europe on a shopping spree. But it is nothing but bad news if you are an auto worker in Lansing threatened by the importation of artificially cheap foreign cars.

The super-strong dollar is nothing but bad news for the Eaton County farmer who wants to export his farm commodities overseas. In fact, in 1984, U.S. agricultural exports fell by $5½ billion from their 1981 level. Very simply, farmers can't sell their goods because of the strong dollar. The consequence is growing domestic surpluses and declining farm income. And now, a major farm credit crisis.

This super-strong dollar has, in fact, contributed to the quadrupling of the Nation's trade deficit since 1980. As our next chart shows, the U.S. spent over $100 billion more on imports that it received for its exports in 1984. It has been estimated that this staggering trade deficit has already cost our economy 2 to 3 million American jobs.

Even if the sky never falls, it is obvious that these huge Federal deficits are exacting a heavy toll on the Nation's economy today. And in addition to the heavy price we pay today, we cannot lose sight of the massive debts that we are leaving for our children to pay tomorrow.

It is obvious that these soaring deficits make "business as usual" simply out of the question.

As this committee sits down to write its fiscal year 1986 budget, we must keep two goals in mind: Our budget must substantially reduce deficits, and it must be fair.

On February 4, the President submitted his 1986 budget proposal to Congress. In broad outline, the President proposes to reduce spending for domestic programs—except for Social Security—by 13 percent (some $40 billion), while increasing Pentagon spending by 12½ percent (some $34 billion). On the domestic side, the President calls for many program terminations and deep cuts. Under the administration's budget, for example, spending on agriculture programs would be cut by 37 percent in 1986.

Very frankly, in my view, the administration's budget fails the fairness test. Unless the belt-tightening required by spending reduction is applied across-the-board, it will not be perceived as fair and will not receive the broad-based public support needed for effective deficit reduction. It is my hope that this set of field hearings will help the Congress to better understand the priorities of the American people so that a meaningful national consensus on deficit reduction measures can be achieved.

I am convinced that in the interests of both fiscal responsibility and fairness, we must put all Federal programs on the table for discussion during consideration of the budget. I personally do not believe that there should be any sacred cows. After we have looked at every piece of the spending puzzle, we must then put together a deficit reduction package in the most responsible and equitable manner possible.

I believe that such an effort will only be successful if we are able to move beyond the partisan finger-pointing and blame-throwing that too often accompany the annual debate on the congressional budget resolution.

It is my hope that all Members of Congress—both Democrats and Republicans—will acknowledge the overriding threat to our economy posed by these deficits and agree to work together in a bipartisan fashion to craft a budget that is based upon the twin goals of fiscal discipline and fairness.●

Mr. ENGLISH. I thank the gentleman from Arkansas for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I think we have heard a very eloquent discussion today of many of the difficulties that are facing American agriculture.

There is no question that we have a crisis on hand. I think the real issue we are going to be faced with in the Agriculture Committee and ultimately throughout the Congress is the question of what we do about it and how we deal with the problem. The thing that struck me is that I do not think that the solution is any great mystery. People have talked a good deal about what we ought to do, but the discussion seems to be more aimed at a particular philosophy or a particular approach, and it seems that year after year, farm bill after farm bill, these same discussions are taking place. They are not geared toward the difficulties that we are facing and what the problems are that we are facing.

I think really, looking at this particular year—and I do believe that this will be the most important farm bill we have experienced in the last 50 years—we have two objectives that we must keep in mind. One is to bring supply and demand back in balance, and second, take back those markets that we have lost over the past 3 to 4 years. In fact, we have lost over 26 percent of our foreign markets since the embargo was implanted in 1980.

In the first place, I think the way that we take back those markets is, for example, that we have to recognize that many of our foreign competitors are using subsidies to compete with us, competing with the American farmer unfairly, because the American farmer is the only farmer who sells directly into the world market, as opposed to foreign governments which sell into other governments. The way we do that is through reciprocity, through balancing out. We tell foreign governments and let them know that if they are going to use subsidies, this Nation will respond in kind. I think then we can tell the American farmer that at last he will have a chance to play on a fair field with a straight deck.

Second, in bringing supply and demand into balance, obviously we have got to provide incentives for our farmers to participate in the program. I have heard many farmers tell me that over the past few years they have felt they have been discouraged from participating in the program, whether it is the $150,000 payment limitations or other aspects of the bill itself which encourage farmers to go out and plant fencerow to fencerow, to utilize every bit of acreage they have and put it into production. Like any other businessman, they are trying to squeeze each and every dollar out of those resources during difficult times.

I think we can bring supply and demand into balance, but we are not going to be able to do it with a weak bill. I think the error we made in 1981 was the simple fact that we tried to implement a piece of legislation that was designed for different times, the times when we had expanding markets, the times when we had virtually no surplus. I think we have got to gear this bill toward bringing supply management more into line. We have got to bring supply down, we have got to bring demand up. I think once we act in that direction, once we understand that we have got to have a stronger bill, one that moves more toward a strong program, one that will encourage each and every farmer in this Nation to participate, then I think indeed we can look forward to solving this problem with the only solution, and that is with a profit in the marketplace.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ENGLISH].

I now yield, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRUCE], a new member of the Agriculture Committee.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Arkansas for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that no institution in America embodies the tradition, security, and good sense of our Nation more than the family farm.

Today, however, this institution is threatened. And we in Congress must be clear on the cause of the current crisis—that farm policy has not kept pace with shifting world economic conditions. But our monetary policy and fiscal policy are also to blame.

Over the last 10 years, farm programs have cost us about 2 percent of the Federal budget while producing up to 26 percent of our gross national product. At the same time, the Federal budget deficit has risen from $26 billion in 1976 to $226 billion in 1986. Along with this rise, real interest rates have spiraled. Consequently 20,000 farm families are in danger of being run out of their business and off their land.

This is not the result of small farmers making bad business decisions; it's the result of large Government making bad economic decisions. And cruelest of all, we now see our Budget Director pointing the finger at the family in the field and telling them it is time to get off their combines and into the bread lines.

I am here today to say that such a policy is shortsighted and simplistic.

Farmers need short-term, immediate help. They need help out of a ditch that we dug. I think we should give them help, not just because they deserve it, which most of them clearly do, but because it's in the best interest of the country as a whole.

It can and should be the policy of this country to protect the family farm. We should help farmers because they are the basis of the structure and stability of rural America. Should they be wiped off our map they will be replaced by large conglomerate farms which will operate on a very small ratio of investment to profit. And as U.S. Steel, Lockheed, and Chrysler have taught us, big firms can get into big trouble.

It will require just a slight adjustment to our budget to assure the maintenance of our most productive industry. I think we would be foolish not to help solve this credit crisis on the family farm.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRUCE].

I now yield, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. STALLINGS], a new member of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having this opportunity to speak.

These last 2 weeks have been weeks of great concern to me. Two weeks ago we listened to a parade of witnesses come through the Credit Subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture, and we listened to a rather sad tale of what is happening in Midwestern America, particularly in rural States. And then this week I spent some time in the eastern Idaho and southern Idaho cities of Pocatello, Twin Falls, Blackfoot, and Idaho Falls listening to similar tales of problems.

We are in fact suffering a crisis in agriculture, and I think to find an equal we would have to go back to the 1920's and the 1930's. We face a crisis in credit, a crisis in low commodity prices, a crisis that will change dramatically the way of life for a significant number of people if in fact nothing is done.

I am hearing spokesmen for the administration tell us that this is the natural way this market economy operates, that we will in fact shake out the inefficient farmers, and that the entire system will be better off.

We have seen over the history of this country a significant change in the number of farmers, from nearly 90 percent of our people in farming down to about 3 percent, and I have to ask, how many inefficient farmers are left? I hear from some of these same spokesmen that we may lose as many as one-third of our farmers this year, but that is not a crisis because we are in fact losing only the inefficient ones.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that there are only two-thirds of our farmers in this country who are efficient, and that the one-third that are going are all inefficient. I think that is a very poor way of saying that the policies of the last few years have not worked.

Now, the next excuse I hear is that we have too many farmers in this country, that the 3 percent of our population engaged in agriculture make up too many farmers. Well, in other areas that has been a logical argument, that we in fact had too many automobile producers, that we perhaps had too many railroads, and that the market does operate best with fewer. But in agriculture the production levels stay the same because, as farmers go out, their land is not taken out of cultivation; their land is taken over by other farmers who perhaps in a more efficient way get even greater production than we had in the past. So if we reduce our farmers by one-third, our production levels will stay the same, and if next year we reduce them by another third, our production levels will still stay the same. The surplus remains, the low prices will remain, and the crisis will continue.

Finally, I hear the cry, "Well, it is because of irresponsible farmers. They got themselves into this mess. Let them get themselves out." Many of my farmers, Mr. Speaker, were forced to borrow because of the incredibly high interest rates. Those interest rates were not driven up by farmers; they were driven up by foolish members of Government who spent beyond their means, foolish members who ran up deficits in the $200 billion category, driving interest rates to high levels.

It was not my farmers in Idaho who lost the overseas markets; it was that same Government whose deficits drove the value of the dollar to all-time highs.

When South American grain can be brought into this country cheaper than it can be bought from our own grain companies, we are in fact in a crisis. There are several things that have to be done. H.R. 1035 is one of them. It is a short-term solution that will provide some credit for our people this year. But we need to restructure the role of agriculture and Government, and, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a part in that restructuring. I am very pleased to have this opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment those who have been involved in the process at this point, particularly the gentleman from South Dakota for his emergency credit legislation. This is an emergency. We need to take emergency actions. If we do not, it will be too late.

□ 1450

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Idaho.

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Arkansas, for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I represent a congressional district in southern Illinois comprised of 21 counties. Mr. Stockman, I call your attention to the fact that there are small farmers in this country. The Agriculture Department currently estimates there are 640,000 full-time, family farmers in this Nation with gross sales ranging from $40,000 to $500,000. There are also 1.7 million farmers with sales under $40,000. But maybe Mr. Stockman will be right soon. Considering the plight of farmers as spelled out in the following statistics I have made available, then maybe we should say there used to be small farmers.

Presently, farm foreclosures are in the thousands nationally. Illinois may have fared better; however, they are up 100 percent since 1982.

As many as 10 to 15 percent of farmers are expected to lose their farms in 1985.

Farm values have decreased in Illinois 21 percent since 1981.

Banks are losing approximately 10 percent of farm loans, compared to 2 percent in the 1970's.

One of every five Illinois bank failures was a farm bank.

Net farm income is down by one-third.

While farm productivity in Illinois is up 15 percent.

As these financial statistics indicate, the farmers and bankers are suffering from a loss of faith. There is a crisis of confidence. For the first time since the depression, we have normally conservative, peaceful farmers demonstrating in the streets. Yet, over 50 were arrested recently for demonstrations in Chicago. And farm organizations in Illinois are threatening a "March on Washington" in March.

Mr. Speaker, considering these facts, and considering the administration's weak response to the plight of farmers, Mr. Stockman may soon be right. There will be no small farmers unless we act. I want to thank my friend from Arkansas and my friend from South Dakota for taking this time to spotlight the need for quick action. I am today introducing H.R. 1035 as a cosponsor and hope that the Committee on Agriculture can report out legislation to give our farmers some badly needed financial assistance.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished friend for his contribution.

I now yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WATKINS].

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I take this opportunity to speak on agriculture, a subject that has been a big part of my life. But it isn't with pride I say that thousands of our farmers are going out of business. And, I'm here today to say that I don't agree with everything the administration says about agriculture. We don't have too many farmers and we don't have an overinvestment in agriculture. When 300,000 people have died in Ethiopia alone from starvation, we don't have too many farmers. First and foremost we must remain committed to our family farmers in that marginal, small, and medium size category.

What do we stand to lose in this country along with the loss of family farming operations? Agriculture and the people who comprise rural America have long set the standard for values for this Nation. When America has needed to find itself, it has always returned to that segment of society for a purging of the soul. The challenge we face not only affects rural areas but, all of this great country.

The basis and strength of this Nation since its colonization and founding has been agriculture, contrary to what some think that defense has been and continues to be that strength.

We have come a long ways but we have even a greater distance to go in the future, especially in the coming year when we will be faced with tax changes, deficit decisions, and setting agriculture policy for the next few years in the 1985 farm bill.

In finding answers to our farm problems, we need a bipartisan effort in our pursuit. The bottom line is that we must have a fair price for our agriculture products. And, I think most farmers would agree in my district that $2.50 a bushel wheat in 1988 is not the answer to our problems. When only 3 cents of wheat goes into the average $1 dollar loaf of bread, someone needs to start asking some questions why the farmer is only receiving such a small amount. If we don't come up with a plan that will give our farmers a fair price for their product, we as consumers will pay the price. When someone is down, do we go ahead and step on him and push him on down or do we reach down and help him up? Hopefully this Nation's policy hasn't degraded to the point where it would encourage the further deterioration of our family farm system.

Granted, oftentimes commodity and credit programs for farmers are costly. But, I think we all would have to agree that even though farmers have received subsidies in the past, the real beneficiary has been the consumer. The American farmer has subsidized the cheap food policy of this country for many years out of his own pocket. The consumer has benefited and the farmer is being foreclosed. As consumers, I don't think anyone of us would want to change a cheap food policy where only 16 percent of our disposable income is spent on food. Subsidies are almost a direct benefit to the consumer.

As far as a free market is concerned, there is no such entity. I think we would all like to believe that such a thing existed and everybody plays by the same rules. But as long as other countries subsidize their producers we must counter that if we do not want to see the demise of the American farmer.

The American farmer has for the past several years been totally at the mercy of elements and events beyond his personal control. The policies of the Reagan-Stockman administration have led to the highest real interest rates in history and the deflation or decline in farmland equity values which is the greatest since the Great Depression. The policies of this administration have led to the highest rate of cheap foreign imports into this country in history, leading to the highest trade deficits in history going in 4 years from $25 billion to $128 billion. Agriculture is the only sustaining factor in our exports and that is diminishing. The strength of the U.S. dollar has weakened farmers' ability to export commodities and as a result we have seen the lowest metric tonnage of agriculture exports in modern times.

Past administrations have contributed to the problems we now face. Our farmers were told by then Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz to expand and plant fence row to fence row and that the markets for the products would be found. That deal was squelched and the farmer was left holding the bag. Under President Nixon a soybean embargo was put into place and then under President Carter a wheat embargo was enacted. And now, President Reagan's Caribbean agreements allow more and more beef and other agriculture products to be imported into the United States to the further detriment of the American farmer.

In none of the embargoes or the trade restraints was the Secretary of Agriculture even consulted, with the Secretary of State making decisions which affect hundreds of thousands of American agricultural producers. Embargoes and trade restrictions have proven to adversely affect only the farmers. The Commodity Credit Corporation reported last year that U.S. exports were down 11 percent and that foreign competitors' production was up 11 percent. They just took up the slack.

We need to get the Secretary of State out of trade policy because they are more inclined to bowing and scraping before foreign dignitaries in a social atmosphere than in conducting hardnosed trade negotiations to recapture a healthy position in international trade for agriculture and other domestic products.

For years, Government has loaded the farmer down with gunny sacks full of problem brickbats and now, that the tide's come in, is telling the American farm family to sink or swim.

Our farmers are being told that they are totally to blame for their current situation. American farmers are not like savings and loans, automakers, nor do they grow computer chips. You can't compare apples to oranges.

Marginal small- and medium-sized farmers are being forced off the land in record numbers in Oklahoma. A record number of 389 bankruptcies for 1 month was filed in the State's western district in January. About 5 percent or 4,000 farmers were forced off the land last year in Oklahoma because of financial stress. Almost 12 percent of our farmers experienced some kind of partial liquidation last year in order to keep farming.

About 25 to 30 percent of our farmers have debt-to-asset ratios of greater than 35 percent. This would be comparable to other States in the 40-percent ratio bracket because 56 percent of our farmers' debt is in nonreal estate debt. This means more short and intermediate loans that will come due faster than land notes. In nonreal estate debt, Oklahoma's farmers rank third in the Nation. With this in mind, our farmers are struggling and are as highly leveraged as any farmers in the Nation.

When I was State president of the Oklahoma Future Farmers of America, there was 26 percent of the population engaged in production agriculture. Now that percentage is 2.4 percent. If any bird, fish, plant, weed, or tree had suffered that degree of depredation, they would have joined the list of endangered species.

I submit to you Mr. Speaker, and to my colleagues, that the American family farmer is an endangered species.

Urban sprawl has taken his farmland. High interest rates, a high valued American dollar, an unsurmountable deficit, and inflated land prices head the list of predators that is contributing to his demise. Life or death is determined by factors beyond his control. Without the stability of a future based only on personal management decisions, his pride in himself has diminished. His sons and daughters have left the farm in droves because they don't want to encounter the insecurity their parents have withstood. Now, many don't have the option. Flame, flood, and drought have decreased his chances for survival.

During the past 200 years, his predators have been many. Now he faces the greatest predators that he has ever fought. Repeatedly he has tried to battle his predators by producing twice as much, working twice as long each day and taking aim at unjustified expense. Yet, it appears he is running out of ammunition. How much longer can he defend his way of life with a gun loaded with low commodity prices that repeatedly have bounced off the enemy?

Animals on the endangered species list stand a better chance for survival than the American farmer. When the bald eagle is gone, it will mean the end of a symbol of freedom and democracy. When the American family farmer is gone, not only will it mean high food costs but the disruption of a society.

This is the year that must make the difference, through farm policy and other legislation that will affect our general worldwide economy. Our answer is not a total repeal of all previous legislation. When our economic policies are geared to be detrimental to agriculture, we are heading for disaster.

One of our most revered statesman, Daniel Webster, spoke of the importance of the closeness of the land.

> Let us never forget that the cultivation of the earth is the most important labor of man. Unstable is the future of that country which has lost its taste for agriculture. If there is one lesson in history which is unmistakable, it is that national strength lies very near the soil.

I'm also reminded of several passages in the Holy Bible. They talk about beating swords and other weaponry into plowshares. As far as our investment is concerned, do we continue to invest in the true strength of this Nation, agriculture, or do we invest massive amounts of money in a false hope and strength that in the end would prove disastrous? The amount our great Nation invests in agriculture is only 5 percent of the amount spent on the military. How, I ask, do we have peace and justice if millions of humans are starving to death?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma, my good friend, for his contribution.

I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. OBERSTAR].

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, there are at least two major alternative solutions to our Nation's farm crisis:

First, the easy route: Announce that the problem is too difficult and any solution too expensive, write off 10 to 20 percent of the Nation's medium-sized family-managed farms, and give up trying to solve the problem.

And, then, there is the harder way:

Recognize, that although the solution will be difficult, and some hard choices will have to be made, the farm crisis is worth solving, and preserving rural America is a sound national policy. That is the course I believe Congress should take.

While some farmers are just not going to make it no matter what the Federal Government does, I am not prepared to write off every family farmer who right now needs financial help from the Government. The argument that "It's about time farmers stood on their own feet" represents an incantation of "know-nothingism" that overlooks the painful consequences for hundreds of thousands of Americans living on farms and the long-term consequences for America's food supply.

Most of the farms facing insolvency in 1985 can make it if we make a commitment of providing those farmers with critically needed and well-deserved assistance.

Hundreds of thousands of American farmers are in desperate financial straits: rising costs, inadequate prices, and oppressive interest on debt repayment overwhelm their income—and the farm policies of the present administration have left these farmers at the edge of financial ruin.

OMB Director David Stockman offers as farm policy a blanket indictment of all farmers who are in trouble, calling them "poor managers." That allegation has become the basis for a policy of allowing tens of thousands, possibly hundreds of thousands, of American farmers to go bankrupt, to lose their land, and to permit the increased concentration of food production.

The Stockman approach is the easy way out—the simplistic approach to a complex problem, the refusal to attempt to develop constructive solutions to the worst crisis facing American farmers since the Great Depression. The Stockman approach is one which totally discounts the value to American life and to the American economy of a rural America with farm ownership shared by large corporations and by individual family farmers. Mr. Stockman's calculus is indifferent to the contributions to the American economy and to the American way of life of farm families who with sound national policies can continue to own their farms, repay their debts, and continue to produce the Nation's food at affordable prices for consumers.

The challenge before Congress now is to develop farm legislation which will ensure the short-term economic survival of those farmers who have the capability to be profitable in the long term. These are the farmers who face financial ruin now, not because of their own errors in management, but because of failed national policies which ignore the effect of years of high interest rates, combined with rising costs, and low prices.

It will not be possible for Congress to fund the kind of program which would be necessary to avoid all farm bankruptcies. The crisis has gone on for so long, the debt burden on some farmers so great, land deflation so severe, and the profitability of certain farms now so marginal, that, given the present political composition of the administration and the Congress, it is impractical to expect a farm program to save these farms.

An unrealistic attempt to push a costly farm bill would only delay the inevitable for that minority of farmers in financial difficulty who are not going to be able to make it in the long term. Such an attempt is the exact opposite of the equally untenable position of David Stockman, which is to write off every single farmer in distress.

If the majority of farmers now in financial trouble had the right kind of financial support, they could make it through the present crisis. That is the category of farmers who need reasonable, pragmatic legislative and administrative programs.

During the just-concluded congressional recess, I conducted farm hearings throughout my district and met with Minnesota Governor Rudy Perpich and his economic crisis committees in an attempt to develop the factual basis upon which to build sound farm credit and farm assistance programs for the next 4 years.

In the next week, I shall, in a separate special order, report to the House on the individual testimonies which I heard at the hearings in North Branch, Milaca, and Aitkin, MN.

The challenge we face is that between 20 percent and 30 percent of our Nation's farmers are insolvent or in danger of becoming so within the next year. The Reagan administration proposal would insure bankruptcy for a majority of those farmers. It would depress land prices further and endanger a whole new group of farmers who are now only moderately in debt. The high-risk category is the approximately 700,000 farms with $50,000 to $500,000 in annual sales—the farmers constituting the medium-sized family farm.

Those farmers, the farm credit system, farm suppliers, the entire fabric of rural America cannot stand the shock of the drastic reduction in Federal assistance proposed in the Reagan administration recently proposed budget. It is an abrupt, insensitive proposal lacking the careful thought necessary to cope with the enormity of the present farm crisis and the implications of wholesale farm bankruptcies.

Clearly, American farmers are facing a transition period. The Federal Government should facilitate an orderly transfer which enables good farmers, sound managers, to remain in farming. We should not take an unthinking, drastic approach which results—unnecessarily—in farm bankruptcies

We must consider the advisability of adopting a production management system which would stabilize farm income; changes in those provisions of the Tax Code which favor partnership and corporate farming as tax shelters; and we must recognize the impact high budget deficits have had on both interest rates and the value of the dollar which have made borrowing costly and have cut demand for American agricultural exports.

I want to thank my colleagues for taking time to arrange this special order this afternoon. This special order, committee hearings, and our public meetings both in Washington and throughout the Nation will increase Members' awareness of the critical issues facing American agriculture and the Nation. If we are willing to make some hard choices, to spend some time developing sensible approaches that respond to the realities of the farm crisis, and, if we are willing to avoid the Stockman-style hatchet approach to the farm crisis, Congress can develop farm legislation which will enable those farmers who can and should survive economically to do so.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Minnesota for his contribution to this issue as well as to many other issues that are debated in this Chamber.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas, my good friend [Mr. GLICKMAN].

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] for their leadership in having these special orders.

It appears to me that if our national security directly were threatened, whether it be from the Soviet Union or from another foe of this country, America would be ready. Readiness is the key. Readiness is the issue that we always talk about in the defense budget.

Well, I believe that our national security is being threatened by a farm economy which is falling apart. You see, we in America have never had to go to war because of a shortage of food supply. We have never had to go to war because we were not ready, we were not prepared in terms of our ability to keep our stomachs fed. That has been the case in Japan, in Western Europe and certainly is the case in Central and South America, Africa, and all over the world.

The national security of the United States is just as significant with respect to an adequate food supply as it is with respect to any weapons systems.

What we are coming down to the House floor today and talking about the plight of our farmers, whether it is on credit or whether it is on the long-term issue of making sure that they stay in business, is an America that remains strong, and a strong resource base in this country particularly with respect to a strong food-producing capability is just as important to a strong America as is a strong defense budget.

So whether it is credit legislation which we desperately need in the short term, or whether it is substantial improvement to the process that farmers get in the long term, both these items relate to the strength and national security of the United States, which is just as important to a person who lives in the inner city of New York or in San Francisco as it is to my farmers in Kansas or your farmers in Arkansas.

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my deep concern for the plight of the American farmer, and especially to voice my opposition to the administration's proposed cuts in farm assistance.

The family farm is in trouble, Mr. Speaker. Rising costs and shrinking markets have slowly whittled away at this great American tradition. Most private farmers are deeply in debt, and find themselves falling deeper annually into a financial crisis. Foreclosures are an ever-increasing sight in many communities, and many older farmers are dissuading young people from becoming farmers.

The administration would like to cut 56 percent in aid to Federal crop programs, as well as most loan and credit programs. They argue that farm programs artificially prop up crop prices. I would submit that declining exports, rising debt, and depressed land prices more than offset any argument the administration might have in favor of assistance cuts.

Mr. Speaker, this is the worst possible time to cut Federal farm assistance. We owe our farmers much more than merely shaking our heads. We owe it to them to keep them in business, and to protect their livelihood.●

INDIANA EIGHTH DISTRICT ELECTION CONTEST

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOULTER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, I also want to add my compliments to the gentleman from South Dakota and the gentleman from Arkansas, my Democratic colleagues, for this special order on this most important problem facing our country today.

I begin my special order 15 minutes late at the request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] so that he could condense his special order and proceed without any interruption, because it all dealt with the subject of agriculture.

I was hoping that some of my Democratic colleagues would remain on the floor of the House so that we could continue to conduct business and talk about another crisis that is facing our country.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, as most of my colleagues have, I spent all of last week in my district. I come from a very rural district, an agricultural district. I also had several farm meetings, farmers' forums. In fact, I had about seven of them and we discussed this crisis at length.

The immediate problem does seem to be how to find and legislate the compassion to solve the short-term credit crunch so that our farmers can plant in the first place, and then when they come to the end of the row they can know that they are at least going to make it through one more season. I am struggling for that and I am struggling for the wisdom to come up with a long-term policy which will restore economic vitality to this basic industry.

We have got to have a bipartisan approach to that problem. That is why it is disappointing to me that I do not see any Democrats on the floor of the House right now.

My people deserve bipartisan approaches to the critical problems facing our country today. They deserve it and they need it, but I cannot help but observe the difference between how this House operates and how the one on the other side of the Capitol Building, the U.S. Senate, operates. The difference between the way the majority party in the Senate approaches the challenges and the way the majority party in this body approaches our challenges is dramatic.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BUSTAMANTE). The gentleman from Texas cannot refer to proceedings in the other body.

Mr. BOULTER. I am observing a difference, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman still cannot refer to proceedings in the other body.

Mr. BOULTER. I am observing the fact, Mr. Speaker, that on our side of the building, in the House of Representatives, the majority party has chosen as its No. 1 task so far keeping Rick McIntyre from being seated, and unlike the Republicans on the other side, the Republicans over here have had to spend valuable time trying to seat Rick McIntyre, who has won an election two times now from the Eighth District of Indiana, who is the only duly certified winner in that race, who is due that congressional seat.

We talk about an agricultural crisis and we are facing one and it needs a bipartisan approach. But I believe that we are facing a constitutional crisis. What has happened in the House of Representatives has been described as a rape of the Constitution because we are trampling on the principle of one man-one vote and majority rule.

Mr. DIOGUARDI. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOULTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DIOGUARDI. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Texas for yielding.

Recently I came before this body to announce my outrage and displeasure at the way the matter of seating the Representative from Indiana's Eighth Congressional District was handled. At that time I said it boiled down to an issue of fairness, fairness to Mr. McIntyre, fairness to the people of Indiana and to the State of Indiana, but probably most of all fairness to the democratic tradition of this great body.

I am still outraged at the way this matter has been delayed and now put into committee.

I would like to read an editorial that appeared Monday, February 11, in the Washington Post entitled "A Seat for Mr. McIntyre."

On the day the 99th Congress convened, a cloud remained over the election results in Indiana's 8th District. Incumbent Democrat Frank McCloskey appeared to be the victor on election night. He was ahead by 72 votes. But after a correction had been made in the count in one county, Republican challenger Richard McIntyre pulled ahead by 34 votes.

Indiana's secretary of state certified Mr. McIntyre as the winner, but the Democrats demanded a full recount in each of the district's 15 counties. That recount had not been completed by the first week in January, and both men showed up to be sworn in when the House met. Because the earlier count had been so close and the recount was still in progress, the House, on a party-line vote, refused to seat either man that day, though both have been on the payroll temporarily. The postponement was reasonable at that time.

Last week a recount of all counties in the 8th District was completed, and the final figures show Mr. McIntyre to be the winner by a comfortable 418 votes. There are no allegations of fraud, and even though thousands of ballots were disqualified during the recount, the action was taken, in 90 percent of the cases, by election commissions dominated by Democrats. Nevertheless, the House on Thursday refused once again to seat Mr. McIntyre—even conditionally—because the Committee on House Administration is reviewing the returns. This process is expected to take another 45 days.

Mr. McCloskey has every right to challenge the result of the election in court, as former Rep. George Hansen has done in his tight Idaho contest. But there is no need for the House to wait for a judicial determination to seat the winner. Nor is it necessary to leave the people of Indiana's 8th District without a voting representative in Congress until April. The votes are in. They have been counted twice. The margin of victory is comfortable, and Indiana election officials have twice certified the winner. The House is the final judge of the qualifications of its members, but until and unless the Committee on Administration finds otherwise, Mr. McIntyre ought to be seated.

I thought it would be appropriate at this time to read this statement. I think it is still outrageous that this matter has not yet been settled and the citizens of the State of Indiana, specifically the Eighth Congressional District, are yet without representation.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOULTER. I now yield to my distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. BARTON].

Mr. BARTON of Texas. I thank my distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. BOULTER] for yielding to me.

As you know, I say to the gentleman, I come from a small town in Texas, in Ellis County. And in spite of the attempts by our Democratic colleagues to keep the lid on the Rick McIntyre/Frank McCloskey race, the word is beginning to get out.

We just heard an editorial read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DIOGUARDI] from the Washington Post of last week. I would like to read another editorial from the Winkler County News, a small town, and it is a county newspaper in Kermit, TX. The publisher is Bill Beckham. The managing editor is Bert Brewer.

The editorial is entitled "Poor Losers."

Residents of Indiana's 8th Congressional District are being denied representation in Washington in a blatant abuse of power by Democrats controlling the House of representatives. Richard D. McIntyre was elected to the House from the 8th District last November, but he still is on the outside looking in.

The election was a close one. Mr. McIntyre was certified the winner over Democrat Frank McCloskey by a scant 34 votes in December. Mr. McCloskey demanded a recount, which was not unexpected.

Now the recount has been completed—by county election commissions that were dominated by Democrats in 11 of the 15 counties comprising the 8th District. Mr. McIntyre again emerged the winner—but by the more substantial margin of 415 votes.

The Democrats are turning out to be poor losers. Rep. Tony Coelho of California, chairman of the party's congressional campaign committee, insists the returns still are not conclusive. He points out that 1,000 ballots were ruled invalid in a precinct with a heavy pro-McCloskey vote but conveniently ignores the fact that thousands more were ruled invalid in precincts that favored Mr. McIntyre.

Election officials in Indiana are satisfied that the election of Mr. McIntyre was on the up-and-up, but the Democratic leadership in the House is insisting that the seat remain open until the House Administration Committee, which it controls, has had a chance to "investigate" the case. The investigation, of course, is a last-ditch effort to find some reason to give the seat to Mr. McCloskey.

This is believed to be the first time the House of Representatives has ever refused to seat a person whose election was duly certified by state-election authorities. If the Democratic majority is allowed to impose its will in this manner, the implications are frightening. Why bother to have elections if the party controlling Congress can overrule the results?

If Mr. McIntyre is not seated promptly, voters in Indiana should seek an order from a federal court granting them the representation in Congress that is being denied to them by the losing side in the November election.

I would like to point out to my colleague from Texas [Mr. BOULTER] that Mr. McIntyre has sought just such an injunction by Federal court here in Washington, DC.

I would like to end by quoting the motto of the Winker County News because I think it is very appropriate. It says, "This newspaper is dedicated to the spirit of civic progress; to the unification of the townspeople in a common purpose for the betterment of our community; to our churches, schools, and homes that Kermit shall ever be a good place in which to live and rear our children. And, above all, honesty, decency, justice, tolerance, faith in Almighty God—these shall be our citidel."

The motto of the Winker County News of Kermit, TX should be the motto of this House and I think we should as soon as possible move again to seat Rick McIntyre so that the people of the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana shall have their Representative in this Congress.

I yield back to the gentleman.

Mr. BOULTER. I thank the gentleman I am very, very pleased to see that the word has gotten down to Winker County, TX. I was really pleased to hear of that editorial.

Mr. STRANG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOULTER. I now yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. STRANG. I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding.

It is a sad day when this body to which I just got elected as a freshman can witness two actions on the first day we meet, the day we took an oath to uphold the Constitution. The first action was to sent a disputed election of a Member from Idaho, and that motion was sponsored and supported on both sides of the aisle. And then to witness the shame of the election in Indiana and the failure of this body to recognize the constitutional right of the State of Indiana, the sovereign State of Indiana, to seat its own Congress people, to send them to Congress.

Rick McIntyre has a certificate from his secretary of state and the election has been recertified.

I would like to read, I would say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOULTER] an editorial from the Detroit Free Press. This is up in the State of Michigan. It is dated February 14, 1985. It is entitled "Democracy in America." It states:

On today's op-ed page, Rep. Guy Vander Jagt gives a fairly detailed chronology of an outrage taking place in the U.S. House of Representatives. The Democratic leadership of the House had decided not to seat Richard McIntyre who, in the judgment of Indiana's secretary of state, won the right to represent Indiana's 8th District in Congress. House Speaker Tip O'Neill, Majority Leader Jim Wright, and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Tony Coelho defend their action by saying the election was improperly conducted, that Republicans threw out lots of votes—particularly in black precincts favorable to Mr. McIntyre's opponent, Frank McCloskey—and that the voters deserve a fresh, new election.

None of these pious justifications make much sense. No one has questioned the honesty of the election and nearly 90 percent of the ballots thrown out were discarded by Democratic election officials. What Democrats really want is to increase their sizable majority—they control more than 58 percent of the House seats, even though they won only 50.03 percent of the votes for those seats—by stealing a close election.

A couple of interesting things have happened since Rep. Vander Jagt wrote his piece, however. First, five Democrats refused to endorse their leadership's decision to ignore democratic tradition. In a vote to kill a Republican-sponsored "privileged motion" that would have seated Mr. McIntyre, Romano Mazzoli and four colleagues thumbed their noses at their party leaders.

Second, Mr. McIntyre and Everett Robertson Jr.—an 8th District voter—have filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, charging that House officials violated their First Amendment rights to free speech and Fifth Amendment rights to due process under the law by refusing to seat Richard McIntyre, give him an office, perform support services, and repay his travel expenses to and from his district. The suit asks the court to seat the Republican, force House Speaker O'Neill to administer the oath of office to the Republican, and demand that House officers give him an office, perform typical duties for the congressman, and grant him admission to House chambers. Democrats have asked to have the suit dismissed.

In a perfect world, the court would agree. The House's imperious action has no precedent in American history. Of the 82 challenged seatings of members-elect since 1933, 81 favored the winner. The only exception was the Rousch vs. Chambers case in 1961, in which Indiana's Republican secretary of state certified two winners but de-certified the Republican incumbent, George Chambers, for alleged vote fraud.

The fraud in the McIntyre case illustrates the danger Alexis de Tocqueville described in Democracy in America—that "the unbounded power of the majority . . . is favorable to the legal despotism of the legislature." Such tyranny, he warned, can weaken people's respect for their leaders and for the rule of law.

Certainly, it's made lots of people question the integrity of the House leadership, which abandoned a tradition that Congress has honored for nearly two centuries when it refused to seat a certified winner of an election. Boss O'Neill and his henchmen have have made a mockery of the democratic process and have sullied the Democratic Party in the process. They deserve whatever grief angry voters and politicians give them for denying Richard McIntyre his rightful place in the 99th Congress.

I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. MONSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I have stated on other occasions that I have become frightened by the precedent that has been set here; frightened because it removes from the States the opportunity to determine who their elected Representatives will be and to certify and have seated those Representatives who are certified by them.

We have seen a precedent that is very dangerous here and some things have already been said about that today that I think need to be enlarged upon. I would like to, in part, do that by reading yet another editorial from the Indianapolis Star dated February 13, 1985, entitled "Suing for a Seat."

The article reads:

There is yet another twist in the tangled tale of Indiana's 8th Congressional District election. Republican Richard McIntyre, twice declared the winner and twice rebuffed by a Democrat-controlled House of Representatives, has now taken his case to a Washington, D.C., federal court.

McIntyre this week filed suit against Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill and the 221 Democrats who voted to keep the Eighth District seat vacant pending a House investigation of the election. He is asking that he be permitted to take office until the House rules on its own findings.

Indiana Secretary of State Edwin J. Simcox had certified that McIntyre had defeated Democrat incumbent Frank McCloskey by 34 votes and a later districtwide recount gave McIntyre a 418-vote edge.

On the opening day of Congress, Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., arguing that the certification was invalid and the election still unsettled, urged that McIntyre not be seated. It would be a disservice to the 500,000 residents of the 8th District "to seat the wrong man today only to have him unseated tomorrow," Hamilton said.

McIntyre's suit contends it is a much greater disservice to deny representation to the 500,000 residents of the 8th District residents, thereby violating their constitutional guarantees of free speech and association.

The House has the prerogative of judging the qualifications of its own members. That authority derives from the Constitution and ought not be questioned. In several respects, therefore, McIntyre's recourse to the judiciary is regrettable.

Yet McIntyre is miffed, and justifiably so, at the House's partisanship. Minutes after the House voted on Jan. 3 to deny Republican McIntyre his seat, it voted to seat another certified winner, Democrat Richard Stallings of Idaho, whose election is being contested by Republican George Hansen. In 82 other elections contested through the years, the House has allowed the certified winner to serve while disputes were settled. So McIntyre's case is unprecedented.

The best outcome would be for the House to recognize that it has made an unfortunate exception in McIntyre's case and permit him to be seated conditionally. If that were done quickly, the suit would be moot and the court would not have to determine if it has jurisdiction.

An in-House settlement would be eminently preferable to a possible testy confrontation between two branches of government.

I think there are a couple of important points pointed out in this article. The first is that we have a certified winner who has been denied a seat; second, we did not use that same precedent in another case on the same day; and third, this is the first time that the House has failed to seat a Member who has been certified the winner without question while a dispute is being resolved.

As I said earlier, I think it is very unfortunate and makes me very nervous that we would take this authority away from those States. It makes me wonder what kind of a signal we are sending to the chief election officers around the country who send, in good faith, certificates of election to us and now find that this House would usurp the power that is rightfully theirs to judge which of their Members should be elected after they have duly certified that election.

This is yet another example of a tremendous abuse of power that we cannot continue to tolerate.

I hope that we will resolve this question immediately, that Mr. McIntyre will be allowed the seat even if it is, as the editorial I have read suggests, conditionally and that we allow those 500,000 residents from Indiana to be represented in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding.

Mr. BOULTER. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

What editorial was the gentleman reading from? What newspaper?

Mr. MONSON. The Indianapolis Star, dated February 13, 1985, just 6 days ago.

Mr. BOULTER. I thank the gentleman.

I yield to the distinguished gentleman and my colleague from Texas [Mr. DELAY]. This is the first time I have heard the gentleman speak on this subject, and I welcome him and thank the gentleman for his good service to all of the freshman Republicans as a member of the executive committee on committees.

Mr. DELAY. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, because I am here the first time to speak on this subject does not diminish my concern for what is going on in this House and my concerns for the Constitution as it was written and intended by our Founding Fathers.

I think it is important to note, Mr. Speaker, that our Constitution and the ability for the House to seat its Members was intended to protect this body from unscrupulous individuals that should not be serving in this body but in no way does Mr. McIntyre fit into that category.

It was never intended to be a political football as it has been used in this, the 99th Congress, and I know that spending a week in my district just recently, it was on the minds of the people of the 22d District of Texas.

Over and over again, questions were asked about the Indiana seat; at least those of my constituents are concerned about the abuse of power that has been exhibited by this House.

I think it is more succinctly put in the Evansville Press. It was written by Dale McConnaughay in the Evansville Press, Evansville, IN, which is a newspaper in the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana.

It says:

DEAR MR. MCCLOSKEY: You have waged a long, valiant and what for you as well as your opponent has to be a frustrating campaign.

That frustration is shared by 8th District constituents who, more than three months after the election, remain without a congressman. Many of those constituents have called this office, or written letters, expressing that frustration. You have no doubt heard from many others.

Some of them say they will never vote again. Fortunately, they appear to be in the minority. Most others have simply become cynical. But that cynicism, left unchecked, represents a cancer to the body politic, to our very democratic tradition.

That tradition, that system, is one that we cherish and respect because it has never failed in exalting individual valor, statesmanship and sacrifice for the common good, especially in the most trying of times where systems themselves seem to fail us.

The time has arrived to again summon those qualities.

What has become evident is that the proper course of action in the current dispute, one representing the best interests of 8th District constituents, cannot be inspired by the system unless it is instigated by the individual.

If you persist in asking your Democratic colleagues who control the U.S. House of Representatives to essentially ignore the 8th District vote, to ignore the certificate of victory awarded your opponent, and to vote among themselves whom to seat, then you may have held onto a seat, but paid a terrible price to do so.

Your own colleagues' apparent reluctance to engage in so brazen, public and raw an act of power politics last Thursday, when five House Democrats defected from the party line and voted their conscience to seat your opponent.

Added evidence of reluctance by your colleagues can be found in the delays. House officials say it could be May—an added three months—before a congressman is seated from this district. As one who has served in that seat and understands the constitutional significance of taxpayer representation, you must find that unacceptable.

No one suggests you abandon your convictions or your proud fight; rather, that you step aside for now until the House completes its investigation, permitting conditional representation from this district by an opponent who at the moment holds the more valid claim to the seat.

What is gained by denying 500,000 residents of the 8th District a voice in Congress over the next three months?

Do you strengthen your claim to be a man who has the best interests of the people of your district at heart?

Do you show yourself to be a fair man who plays by the rules, even where those rules may appear less than favorable to your cause?

Do you enhance your reputation as a public servant?

Or, do you invite the incisive remarks from people like Rep. Bill Frenzel, the ranking Republican on the House Administration Committee, who charged last Thursday that: "The only way McCloskey can win is if he confuses his cronies so that they violate the law of the United States and the State of Indiana and vote him into Congress."

Much has been said in the long period since the November 6 election about "good faith."

Voters cast ballots in good faith on November 6. However technically flawed ballots may have been, it seems a terrible miscarriage of justice to have tossed out thousands of them district-wide lacking conclusive evidence of any fraud.

The various local bipartisan commissions conducting recounts of ballots did so in good faith, though again flawed by inconsistent procedures from one county to the next which neither you nor your opponent protested sufficiently at that time.

The results soon after the election saw your opponent certified the winner by fewer than 50 votes. A Republican secretary of state who delayed certifying a winner can be criticized only for not having delayed that certification long enough, until the full recount was complete. But when that recount was complete, the margin of victory for your opponent grew to more than 400 votes.

"Good faith" on your own part should require respecting House tradition and permitting an opponent holding a victory certificate to be seated conditionally until you have satisfied the burden of proof that he doesn't have the right to his seat.

Since this is the kind of individual valor, statesmanship and sacrifice for the common good which is so desperately needed just now to regain some measure of voter trust and confidence.

I think this speaks quite well, Mr. Speaker, to the point that what is going on in the Eighth District, it seems that the voters are confused because it seems that a campaign is being waged even at this time.

I think it is very important to note that the facts are right on our side; we know that McIntyre has won this race; we know that there has been an abuse of power, and the people of the Eighth District of Indiana will ultimately know that McIntyre should be seated even if it is conditionally, because they want respresentation for the Eighth District of Indiana.

Mr. BOULTER. I thank my good friend from Texas for reading the editorial from the Evansville Press, located in the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana, the district which Congressman-elect McIntyre has now twice won.

I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COBEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would like my colleagues to know that I have just gotten off the phone with Mr. Rick McIntyre from Indiana, and I am amazed at how courageous he is and how upbeat he is, and I am delighted to know that he is going to make such an outstanding Member of this body.

I just wish we would get on with the process and do what is right and have him seated.

I guess as we are reading these editorials, it is nice to reflect on the fact that we can live in a country that has a free press, and I hope that everybody in this body will recognize that the press has seen this situation for what it is, and all across our country we are seeing editorial writers come out on the side of Rick McIntyre, which is, or course, to come out on the side of what is right.

□ 1530

Mr. Speaker, I would like to read today an editorial that appeared in the Detroit News on January 28, 1985, under "Our Opinions." It is titled "The Undemocratic Party."

[From the Detroit News, Jan. 28, 1985]

THE UNDEMOCRATIC PARTY

The Democratic Party, ostensibly the party of compassion and fairness, has decided that Republican votes don't count in Indiana's 8th Congressional District. Indiana's secretary of state has certified Richard McIntyre as the victor in his race against previous incumbent Democrat Frank McCloskey, and a recount this week widened his ostensible margin of victory from 34 votes to 415 votes.

But House Speaker Tip O'Neill and Tony Coelho, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, have declared the voters and the Indiana officials wrong. Nothing has changed the fact that Frank McCloskey won on Election Day, and an honest, complete, and nonpartisan vote count will confirm that, Rep. Coelho said recently. So the Washington pols have voted themselves the power to overturn the judgment of the people of Indiana.

Here's what happened. Republicans learned on election eve that the returns from two precincts had been counted twice, giving Mr. McCloskey an apparent victory. They asked the local county clerk to notify the secretary of state that the results from that county were in error, but the clerk, a Democrat, refused. Republicans took the matter to court, where a Democratic judge eventually ordered the clerk to amend the results. When that was done, Mr. McIntyre was certified the winner by the secretary of state (a Republican), and the results were forwarded to the clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Under normal procedures, that would have been the end of the matter. No one had alleged fraud in the election, and no one implied that Mr. McIntyre had done anything shady or undignified. Democrats didn't even bother to challenge the results under the Contested Elections Act, which sets forth a procedure for reviewing very tight elections. The law in effect lets the House review an election much as a court would—taking depositions, reviewing evidence, even demanding a new election. At first, they tried to have the recount thrown out, asking a federal court to find fault with Indiana's recount procedure. The judge dismissed the case.

Meanwhile, a series of recounts was taking place in Indiana. County clerks appointed three-member, bipartisan election review boards, which examined ballots and double-checked procedures. Those recounts enlarged Mr. McIntyre's margin by 381 votes.

Still, Reps. O'Neill and Coelho wouldn't rest. They strong-armed colleagues into accepting House Resolution 1—the first legislation of the session—that essentially gave the House Administration Committee, and not the people of Indiana, final say about the election. The Democratic leaders argued that a 1961 case, in which Democrat Ed Rousch was seated after earlier results had given Republican George Chambers the victory, offers a precedent. But in that case, the Indiana secretary of state invalidated his own certification of victory for Mr. Chambers, after verifying charges of election fraud. As we noted above, there were no such charges or changes in certification this time around.

House leaders have merely confirmed that they believe in the one-man, one-vote concept only if it favors Democrats. Consider a few interesting statistics: Democrats won 50.03 percent of the popular vote for House seats this year, but district lines drawn by state legislatures gave them 58.16 of the seats in the House. By the same token, the membership on key committees hardly reflects Americans' preferences on policy. Democrats hold 58.7 percent of the votes on the Budget and Armed Services committees and 61.4 percent of the seats on the Appropriations Committee.

The McIntyre case demonstrates with frightening clarity how politicans can abandon their principles for partisan reasons. In a fairer world, the House would seat Richard McIntyre provisionally, and let the courts or the sovereign people of Indiana do what they must to resolve matters further. He has, by any reasonable standard, won that seat fairly. His only sin seems to be that he didn't win by enough votes to make Tip O'Neill happy.

I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding so that I could read this very clear and very precise analysis of the situation.

Mr. BOULTER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, first I want to say that I appreciate the leadership that my distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. BOULTER] has taken on this issue in trying to see that a half million citizens in Indiana get the representation that they are entitled to.

I would like to share with my colleagues, if I could, an editorial from the Evansville Press, a newspaper in Indiana, in that district, that very Eighth District in which the struggle rages.

It is entitled "Time To Take a Seat."

TIME TO TAKE A SEAT

The time has come for the United States House of Representatives to lay politics aside and consider the people of the 8th Congressional District of Indiana.

In its most recent action, the House once again refused to seat either Richard McIntyre or Frank McCloskey as the winner of last November's election. Instead, the House is conducting its own investigation of the close race and will report its findings by late April. As a result, it is likely the 8th District will be without representation until May, or beyond.

This is reprehensible and unacceptable.

That the House has the right to—and should—investigate the close election is not the question here. What is questionable is why the House does not seat the apparent winner until information to the contrary comes to light.

Mr. McIntyre, the Republican, was certified the original winner by a very slender margin, fewer than 50 votes; now, after a recount, he has again been declared a winner, by a more substantial 418 votes.

Mr. McCloskey, the Democrat, argues that the recounts were conducted under haphazard and inconsistent rules, and with that this newspaper agrees. But no where is anyone alleging fraud, and most of the commissions that participated in the recounts were dominated by Democrats. The fact that the recounts were inconsistent should not hinder the seating of Mr. McIntyre until the Democrat controlled House proves that recount certified the wrong man, or until a more consistent recount is ordered by the House Administration Committee, which now is handling the matter.

The argument that neither candidate should be seated until that committee reaches a decision ignores the fact that there are two other disputed elections now before the committee, and in both cases, the certified winner has been seated pending a resolution.

No one argues with Mr. McCloskey's right to challenge the result of the election. But Mr. McIntyre should be seated—conditionally—while that challenge is being resolved so the people of the 8th District of Indiana at least have someone in Congress to handle their affairs.

The votes are in. They have been counted twice. Mr. McIntyre has won both times. A serious responsibility now rests with the House. It must determine either that the recount was in error and another recount is justified, or it must seat Mr. McIntyre. In either event, it must follow its own tradition and seat the certified winner. Mr. McIntyre, in the interim.

By refusing to do so would only prove many people's worse suspicions: that the U.S. House of Representatives is more interested in playing politics than serving the people it has been entrusted to represent.

All voters in all districts, should remember that the next time the polls open.

□ 1540

That concludes the editorial from the Evansville (IN) Press

I would just like to add a few words of my own.

Mr. Speaker, when I was back in my district and I was asked what great subjects the Congress took up in our first month, did we take major votes on the deficit or the budget or other issues like that, I said, "No."

They said, "Well, what major issues did you discuss?"

And I said, "The major issue we voted on not once, but twice, was whether to seat Rick McIntyre."

After I explained this issue to my constituents there seemed to be agreement that the lesson so far in this sad case is this: That if you are a member of the minority and you win a close election, watch out, because the House of Representatives, the majority, may choose not to seat you.

I hope that the House will rectify this wrong and seat Rick McIntyre and give the half million voters in Indiana's Eighth District the representation they deserve.

I thank my distinguished colleague from Texas for yielding to me.

Mr. BOULTER. I thank the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I just returned from a trip back into my district in New Hampshire, the First Congressional District. It is an area of the country where we hold town meetings, and often times we elect people by one or two votes, and frequently we make decisions that affect the entire town by just a handful of votes. As I held a series of what I call citizens' forums or town meetings in my district this past week, ironically, and, frankly, a surprise to me was the fact that the question regarding the Rick McIntyre race in the Eighth District in Indiana came up. I would point out to my colleagues on the opposite side of the aisle that frequently the question regarding this issue was asked by Democrats as often as it was by Republicans. And in trying to explain at least what I thought was the correct position on the issue, people would respond to me, "How are you going to resolve the issue of the deficit, the issue of a strong defense, the issue of poverty, helping our Nation's farmers, getting our budget balanced and literally getting America back on the track that it belongs, how are you going to do that if you cannot seat an individual who wins an election in your body?"

Do you know what? I do not have an answer to that question. But I suggested to the individuals who asked me that they direct that question in writing to the leadership of this body, specifically the Speaker of the House of Representatives, because I think that is a fair question, a question which has not been answered.

It is time to look toward future generations in this country rather than future elections. This individual, Mr. McIntyre, has won an election and he ought to be seated.

I was told when I got here to listen carefully when you speak on the floor of the House of Representatives because frequently no one else is listening other than you. That is an interesting conclusion, and I have come to believe as I have been here that it is true, for the most part. But I would like to point out the amount of hours and time that a large number of individuals have spent on this issue because they feel so deeply. I think most of us realize that as freshman Members many of us, most of us, have made our first remarks to this body on this issue, on the Rick McIntyre issue, ahead of issues like the deficit and ahead of issues like poverty and the farmers. Why? Because the Eighth District of Indiana does not have the opportunity to have one stand before this body and talk about our Nation's farmers and talk about the deficit and talk about poverty or any other issue that might be of consequence.

I ask the Members on the opposite side of the aisle to look into their hearts, to look into their consciences instead of looking to their leadership, because I submit to you that in this particular case your leadership is wrong and all you need to do to change that is to look into your own hearts. Many of you I know personally. We have talked and I find you to be fair men and women. It is time to seat Rick McIntyre. He won the election. It is time he be seated, and you have the power to do it.

Frequently, as this issue gets unfolded, we tend to believe what we want to believe, listen to whom we want to listen, and nobody seems to have any credibility anymore. However, the remarks that I have heard, on our side of the aisle anyway, I think essentially represent the facts, and I would like to read a letter to the editor that was written by GUY VANDER JAGT on Thursday, February 14, that appeared in the Detroit News, because I think it sums up the facts— and that is all we are looking at here, the facts. I would like to read it, as follows:

HOUSE DEMS CONSPIRE IN THEFT OF AN ELECTION

(By Guy Vander Jagt)

A crime is being committed in the U.S. House of Representatives affecting half-a-million people today and perhaps many more in the future. The Democrats in the House continue to refuse to recognize Rick McIntyre as the winner in Indiana's 8th Congressional District. They vow to leave the seat vacant until they construct a formula to thwart the voters of Indiana and throw the election to their man, Frank McCloskey.

When this matter came before the House on Jan. 3, I warned of dire consequences if the Democrats persisted in their refusal to seat Rick McIntyre. The precedents set in this situation could allow the Democrats in the House to discard the election laws in any of our 50 states and on their whim refuse to seat members of Congress who have been duly elected and certified by the officers of their states.

To hear House Majority Leader Jim Wright of Texas tell it, the governor of Indiana, the Indiana secretary of state, and the duly elected congressman from Indiana's 8th Congressional District, Richard McIntyre, all conspired to break the laws of Indiana to the extent that "the election procedures employed by the 8th Congressional District have been neither timely nor regular and serious questions have been raised with respect to their fairness."

But Democrats like Mr. Wright base their case on myths, not facts, and have voted en bloc (with five exceptions) to declare the 8th District Congressional seat vacant—until they can figure out how to win an election they had lost. Consider the facts:

Fact one: Rick McIntyre won the election by 34 votes based on all of the ballots as they were counted on election night. The election result was duly certified by the constitutional officers of the state of Indiana.

Fact Two: Rick McIntyre won the election a second time based on a recounting of the votes in all 1,225 precincts. The recount controlled by the Democrats in 11 of the 15 counties, increased Rick McIntyre's lead to 415 votes. The Democrats in the House could not tip this election in their favor on the basis of election night tabulations or a recount that they largely controlled. Instead, they are attempting to steal the election from the people of Indiana by moving the entire process to the back rooms of Congress.

Now consider the myths upon which the Democrats' case rests:

Myth 1: Frank McCloskey won based on election night tabulations.

Not true: Frank McCloskey was never the leader in this race based on correct election night returns. The morning after the election, Rick McIntyre was the leader. Tabulation errors, however, were discovered in some original county totals, and the county clerk in Vanderburgh County, a Republican, corrected her error, giving McCloskey a 72-vote lead. The clerk in Gibson County, a Democrat, refused to correct his tabulation error—he added the totals of two precincts twice—because he realized it would wipe out McCloskey's lead and prove McIntyre the winner.

In both counties the errors and corrections involved tabulating the results of precincts and never at any time involved the recounting of any ballots. Eventually, the Indiana Supreme Court ordered the clerk in Gibson County in effect to correct his error apart from any recount.

The clerk did so and transmitted the correct election night results to the secretary of state, who in turn was able to certify Rick McIntyre the winner by 34 votes. The distinction between a correction and a recount is important because otherwise county clerks could make intentional tabulation errors to force the certification of the wrong winner. The safeguards of Indiana law ensure that a winner will be certified based only on correct election night tabulations and not on recounts.

Myth 2: Rick McIntyre was certified the winner in this race based on a recount in only one county.

Again, not true: Despite controlling 11 of the 15 recount commissions, each with two Democrats to one Republican, Democrats could not turn the tide to McCloskey. Rick McIntyre's lead actually grew to 415 votes when all of the recounting was completed

Myth 3: The recount, which the Democrats insisted be completed, is no longer a valid measure of the winner in this race.

This is a last-resort argument. If Frank McCloskey and the Democrats had any real evidence to support their claims, they would have invoked the Federal Contested Elections Act (FCEA), which was established in 1969, and set the rules governing when the House of Representatives would become involved in a House race. The Democrats missed the deadline to invoke this act, which requires them to establish a threshold of proof for their allegations. Since they do not have the proof to invoke the FCEA, they are trying to use the strength of their numbers in the House to overturn the election results.

Never before in the history of America has the House blatantly interferred in the state election process. Never before has the House refused to seat a congressman whom state officials agree is the winner in a congressional contest. Democrats have tried to argue that the McIntyre case is similar to Rousch vs. Chambers in 1961, but that's not true.

In the earlier dispute, both Mr. Rousch and Mr. Chambers had been certified as winners by state officials. In the current situation, the duly elected state officials in Indiana have certified only one winner. The laws, recount procedures, and valid election certificates that have applied for every other Indiana candidate—including Mr. McCloskey when he was elected in 1982—are now deemed to be inappropriate by the Democrats in the House of Representatives.

This action by the Democratic Majority has caused Rick McIntyre to pose the question, "How many votes does a Republican have to win by in order to be seated in the Democrat-controlled House?" It also has forced many Republican members to question whether in future years the Democrats could arbitrarily decide not to recognize the election certificates of any Republican member.

There is no question that Rick McIntyre won this election by 34 votes based on the correct election night tabulation of all of the votes in the district or that he won a second time when the recounting of ballots in all 15 counties increased his lead to 415 votes.

The longer the Democrats persist in their refusal to seat Rick McIntyre, the greater the stench becomes. The American people should demand that the Democrats quit toying with the election laws of a sovereign state and reverse their decision to reject a valid certificate of election. Rick McIntyre deserves a seat in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I would just reiterate that on the same day, January 3, one of the Democrat Members was challenged and all 182 Members of the Republican Party voted for that gentleman's seat because it was the right thing to do. I admit there was a little talk about perhaps not voting for him, but the Republicans responded saying two wrongs do not make a right. We seated that gentleman, and it is interesting to note that that gentleman voted against the seating of Mr. McIntyre.

Ladies and gentlemen, the American people are watching and there will be a price to pay. It will not be a political price; it is the Constitution of the United States that is suffering today. As a former teacher who taught that document and taught young people to respect it, I think it is a sad blemish on this body. I encourage my colleagues on the other side of the aisle to change their votes and let us make this situation right so that we can get on with the business of the earlier problems that I spoke of.

I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding.

Mr. BOULTER. I thank my colleague, Mr. SMITH from New Hampshire.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard editorials today written from the Winkler County News, the Detroit Free Press, the Detroit News, the Indiana Star, the Evansville Press, and yes, the Washington Post, and it is rare that we see such unanimity among so many editorial writers. I know of no editorial writer who has taken a side differing from what you have heard today, Mr. Speaker.

Editorial writers across this country are beginning to understand that this issue is not an issue between Republicans and Democrats but between the Democrat side of the aisle in this House versus democracy. Mr. Speaker, we have had two votes now, one on January 3 following Rick McIntyre's victory of 34 votes, and one on February 7 following Rick McIntyre's victory in the recount process of 418 votes. He has won twice.

On the last vote, taken February 7, five Democrats who understood the facts of this case decided to vote in the interest of fairness and justness over partisanship. Three of those were from Texas.

I look forward to many other of my colleagues on that side of the aisle, once they understand the issues involved here and get the true facts, doing the same. Mr. Speaker, we have talked about the need today for a bipartisan approach especially to the dire need of our farmers and the agricultural problems in our country. We also need a bipartisan approach to this constitutional crisis. A crisis created not by my many well meaning friends and uninformed friends on the Democratic side of the aisle, but by the leadership of the Democratic Party.

AMBASSADOR MARK EVANS AUSTAD

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, since 1981, the United States and President Ronald Reagan have been represented in the great nation of Norway by Ambassador Mark Evans Austad.

Ambassador Austad, although previously having served as our country's Ambassador to Finland, is not considered a professional diplomat.

Recently, President Reagan has been bombarded with suggestions that only career employees of the State Department are qualified to represent him and our country in ambassadorial posts abroad. The great tribute paid to Ambassador Austad by the Norwegian people, which was carried recently in Norway's largest newspaper, Aftenposten, indicates that private citizen, noncareer diplomat and great American, Mark Austad, has served our country and President Reagan exceedingly well in his ambassadorial post in Oslo.

The opening paragraph of the Norwegian people's farewell to Ambassador Austad tells it all in relating that the most indispensable commodity in life is not security, peace, or prosperity, but freedom. For without freedom, we in the United States know very well that nothing else has any real value, but we, my colleagues know that only a strong defense will guarantee freedom.

We can be proud of Ambassador Austad for his outstanding and dedicated service in defense of liberty and freedom. He worked for a strong, cohesive NATO, traveled and spoke extensively throughout Norway for an effective defense against Soviet aggression. We can be proud because he was held in such high regard by the people of Norway themselves.

I would like to share the words carried in Aftenposten with my colleagues, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD at this point.

[From the Aftenposten, Sept. 11, 1984]

FAREWELL TO A GOOD NORWEGIAN

It happens that we meet people who dare to maintain that freedom is an indispensible commodity in our life. Not security, not peace, not prosperity. Freedom. It happens, but not often.

It happens that we meet people who by the power of their position can work for freedom and peace, cooperation and friendship across national borders—and who do so with flying colors.

Who in spite of their position dare to walk new ways, dare to laugh and cry, dare to maintain the truth and stick to their guns, dare to rise above mediocrity, dare to be in the line of fire.

It happens, but not often.

Mark Evans Austad, you are such a man.

You have been the Ambassador of the United States in Norway since 1981. You have been an Ambassador for Norway all your life. Now you are resigning for personal reasons. Do you think most Norwegians actually know what you have accomplished?

Do they know that you are an honorary member of the Linge Club?

That you want to raise a peace monument in Oslo in commemoration of American soldiers who fell in the battle for Norway during World War II?

That you have seen more of this country than most Norwegians and that you have actually made a film about Norway intended for Americans?

Do they know that you have been just as much Norway's man in the United States? That you again and again have been an advocate for Norway and Norwegian industry in Norway? That you stood in the front on the barricades when the storms hit Norwegian whaling and sealing and a boycott was threatening?

That you, most unusual for diplomats, have given talks on freedom and peace, East and West—in schools, associations and clubs all over Norway? That you have taken time to become acquainted with the average Norwegian?

Do they know that you are the driving force behind the Heart Fund and that the National Association for Health has given you their highest award?

We don't think so.

Perhaps your view on NATO is more known: "The best club in the world." You assert this indefatigably and explain convincingly why it is so important to be prepared. It is reassuring for us who neither believe in Russian ideals not their peace promises. And we know that your view is shared by your President.

You may not know this yourself, but you have been an ambassador for the people in the finest sense of the word. For Norway and Norwegians. For the United States and Americans.

We shall have to search long for a better ambassador. We shall have to search long for a better Norwegian.

You have done more to improve and develop the relations between our two countries than the Norwegian press will ever discover. You have spoken for freedom and the West so well and so enthusiastically that this more than ever compensates for the sour U.S. attitude that characterizes our press.

Mark, you have been a blessed, energetic and outspoken ambassador. Straight to the point, interested, courageous—always under the motto: "Facts holy, opinions free." It shows on you that you like your job. You have managed to combine a sober and moderate way of life with cheerfulness and courage. No rigid diplomacy creating distance, but genuine feelings and engagement creating closeness. You care.

Let this be a greeting from all your friends and the friends of the United States in Norway. Let this be a greeting from us who know that you will be our best ambassador, even after you have gone home to your own people in Arizona.

We are many, and we have much to thank you for. And at this time our dear King has awarded you the Grand Cross of St. Olav. It happens that we meet people who leave deep, good tracks behind. It happens, but not often. Ambassador Mark Evans Austad, we'll miss you. Vi kommer til a savne deg. Often.●

STEEL IMPORT AGREEMENTS WILL NOT EASE THE PRESSURE ON AMERICA'S STEEL INDUSTRY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, for most industries, 1984 was a banner year, but for the steel industry, the picture presented in 1984 was dim, at best, and the outlook for 1985 doesn't appear to be improving.

The year 1984 saw an unprecedented surge in steel imports, with shipments breaking the 30 percent share of supply at least twice during the year, most recently in December when imports of steel accounted for more than 31 percent of total steel supply in the United States.

For the full year of 1984, steel imports represented 26.7 percent of the total domestic supply, a far cry from the 13 to 15 percent registered just a few years ago.

And, quite frankly, despite the voluntary agreements reached between the United States and seven steel exporting nations, I don't believe the picture will brighten significantly.

Even the best estimates are that steel imports under the voluntary agreements will come in above the 18.5 percent the administration said it was setting as its target. In fact, most steel analysts estimate the level of imported steel of total supply, under the new agreements, will fall between 21 and 22 percent.

This, if it holds up, will not provide the impact and help the steel industry needs. In 1983, imported steel captured 20.5 percent of the market in the United States. In 1984, the import steel share was 26.7 percent. And, if the prospects for 1985 are such that imports will be a 21-percent share, then the steel industry in this country has little to look forward to.

Let's face it, the American steel industry's worst earning years prior to 1984 were 1982 and 1983. In 1982, steel firms in this country lost $3.2 billion and in the 1983, the loss was $3.6 billion. And, while the figures are not yet in for 1984, most experts believe there has been little, if any, improvement in the cash flow picture for America's steel industry.

The one exception may be United Steel Steel, but only because its non-steel operations and the sale of other assets have provided enough funds to overcome the continuing steel downturn.

It is interesting that within weeks of this administration's sought after agreements with seven of the steel exporting nations, representatives of this administration asked the Congress to amend last year's trade bill by increasing the number of categories of steel to be covered by the voluntary agreements.

Why did the administration seek this change? It's quite simple really—the administration wants to be able to turn to those steel exporting nations to urge them to comply with the agreements or face further restrictions.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we had the opportunity to provide this administration with a better club last year with the Fair Trade in Steel Act. That bill, which would have set a fixed quota of 15 percent market share of the American steel supply, would have been the most productive move we could have undertaken.

But we didn't act on that bill. A majority of this House decided to go along with administration with the result that the American steel industry still rests—and will continue to rest—on a very precarious foundation.

With automobile and appliance production at or slightly past their peaks, demand for flat-rolled steel could actually slip for 1985. And, while there will be a continuing rise in capital spending, according to analysts, which will boost demand for heavier grades of steel, this will be blunted by rising machinery imports.

The upshot: Domestic steel producers may ship as little as 75 million tons in 1985, just a shade above 1984's 73 million tons, but a far cry from 1979's 100 million tons.

This probably will mean continued restructuring of the industry, and, say some analysts, this restructuring could even affect the minimills, those regionally located operations that provide a narrower product line than the giant integrated mills.

Ken Iverson of Nucor Corp., one of the most successful minimill operations in this country, expects some of the less efficient operators to be eased out of the business because of their inability to compete. As Iverson indicates, the stronger minimill firms will continue to move into higher-priced products and specialty items will put more pressure on major steel producers.

As far as the major steel firms are concerned, some, like Wheeling-Pittsburgh, are fighting for survival. The expectations are that prices are not going to increase, as earlier some predicted they would once the voluntary agreements with steel exporting nations were signed.

As of last month, in fact, cold-rolled sheet steel, one of the most important products, was available for less than $400 per ton—more than $100 below book prices.

So here we are. The administration is touting its voluntary agreements with seven exporting nations as the definitive step in giving America's steel industry the opportunity to get out of its doldrums.

But the fact of the matter is that the administration's prenegotiation goal—an 18.5-percent share of the American steel market—was just a figure pulled out of the air to allay the fears of the steel industry and to destroy the idea of firm quotas for steel imports.

The end result is an import share figure that will not really improve the picture for the domestic steel industry because, while it does drop levels from 1984's unprecedented height, it still suggests that we are accepting an import level higher than that in 1983, the first of the surge years.

Does this mean that the American steel industry will close more plants? Probably.

Does it mean that more American steelworkers will lose their jobs permanently? More than likely.

And it also means that we have put our Nation in jeopardy, perhaps even to the point from which we will be unable to recover.

Mr. Speaker, I urge every Member of this body who believes that we must strengthen the basic industries of this Nation to follow closely the developments in steel and steel imports.

I am sure if they do, they will understand the need for sure solutions, not just rhetoric.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to take at this time the rest of my time and go into another subject matter, but I think both matters are closely related.

If we persist, as far as losing our international status and our ability to provide this country with basically and fundamentally its need for defense purposes—and I am not talking about other needs and purposes, but defense purposes—and we are going to get into the other subject matter because, No. 1, why educate a population if there is no need to educate the population, because you have no country, no fundamental country, no area or sphere of influence internationally, no standing, no respect, and all because we have a contradictory trade policy, all because we do not understand, or those who are in the sensitive areas do not understand, what this Nation must do as far as trade is concerned, and steel in particular.

Many people have particularly stated that they are free traders, and if you take a position where you are going to limit some trade, or steel coming into this country, then you are contrary to the dictates of history and you are destined to live with the consequences. I would like to point out to those individuals that had we passed the 15 percent quota bill, which had been signed onto by 230 Members of this House, had we passed that quota bill, that this country would still have had the largest free market in the world, and that is compared percentage-wise with the Japanese market, with the European Community market, and any other market in the world. It would still be the largest market, steel market and otherwise.

So we are not practicing protectionism when we advocate what I advocate as far as a reasonable quota, or as I advocated in the past, that we do something meaningful. We have had several test cases in specialty steel. We have had them in the regular steel, the ferro steel industry, the specialty steel, and we have had them in carbon steel. We have had test cases where by we have put on restrictions and did not disturb free trade and, yes, we had the practical results, and the results were that our steel industry flourished and was kept strong and the foreign countries still had their markets and we still have been supporting the world, so to speak.

I can take any major producer of steel, take the statistics and show you that when you twist them around, that exporter, and Japan in particular, Korea is another one, Taiwan is another place, Brazil, and go all the way down the line, take Italy and the Common Market, all of them, and you will find that they are unfair in how they treat steel going into their country as counter-distinguished as to how they want to be treated when they send their steel to this country. I am not talking about all of the different factors involved, which include dumping, and under- and over-pricing, and what have you. I am talking just fundamentally about fundamental fairness, fair trade, between the trading partners. Every time we have some limitations, every other country, as witnessed by facts and by cases that are a matter of record in this country, every other country is cheating, or trying to cheat, and they do cheat, and we have caught them cheating, and they have bought their way out of it.

I mentioned that in the television case, and I mentioned that in prior special orders when we talked about steel, specialty steel, and what have you.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am going to let that subject rest and very hurriedly go into the subject involving education which is so important to this country.

AN UPSIDE-DOWN VIEW OF THE WORLD OF EDUCATION

Mr. Speaker, over the past few years, we have seen an increasing interest in the quality of education our young people are getting in the public schools.

The issues under debate have focused on the curriculum, the length of the school day and year, and a host of other concerns linked to overall quality.

But the most intense debate has focused on the single most important element in the education program—the classroom teacher.

All of us can point to a teacher or two who made a difference in our lives—a teacher who unlocked a door we didn't even know existed.

Great teachers can do that. They can encourage their charges to explore new worlds; they can motivate their students to great achievement, even if those gains aren't realized for years after the students have left school.

Conversely, we know that poorer teachers cannot do those things, can't fire the imaginations of their students.

During the debate on the quality of teaching, we have learned that many of those who enter teaching are not among the top level students in our high schools. Whether this means that only they will be better teachers, no one, including me, knows. Personally, I believe most of the teachers in our classrooms today are good teachers, devoted to their students and intent on helping them achieve success.

A more serious problem, however, is the departure from the classroom of many good and great teachers. They are leaving the classroom for jobs in administration, because the pay is higher. They are leaving education entirely for jobs in the private sector because they will be paid better and achieve a higher degree of respect.

And still we search for ways to attract better students into teaching as a profession and to keep those good and great teachers in our classrooms.

Every one of us knows that teachers' salaries are low in comparison to the responsibilities they have. The average salary in teaching today is just over $22,000 a year. It is true that the average salary has jumped substantially in the past 10 years, but not when compared to salaries for other professionals with similar education requirements.

At the same time we bemoan the salary levels for American teachers, we see sport figures signing contracts with enormous price tags—$10 million over 5 years; $40 million over a lifetime; $500,000 for 1 year of play.

I am sure it must be disheartening to those who have been teaching for several years or to those who are giving some consideration to teaching as a career.

But just imagine a different world. A world in which school systems offered big-dollar, long-term, no-cut contracts to teachers.

Well, that is the world created by James J. Coogan, an American history teacher at Dennis-Yarmouth Regional High School in Yarmouth, MA.

I came across Mr. Coogan's brilliant tongue-in-cheek approach while reading the February 15 issue of Education Week. I am sure that at the same time Mr. Coogan was writing his parody, he must have felt some wishful thinking.

I commend this commentary to you because it puts into perspective some of the problems we will be faced with in trying to bring potentially good and great teachers into our classrooms and in trying to keep the good and great ones there.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to take just 5 minutes—I think I can do it in 5 minutes—to read the commentary which appeared in the article I have quoted. This is Mr. Coogan speaking from here on out, and I am reading verbatim from his article. If you listen, I think you will find it most interesting. The entire article is as follows:

TEACHER INKS 3-YEAR, $850-K PACT WITH REGIONAL

(By James J. Coogan)

I was dreaming the other day that I read in the paper about John Smith, a local high-school history teacher, who had signed a three-year, $850,000 contract to stay on at Regional High School.

"He can really do it all," said his principal yesterday at a news conference held in the cafeteria. "He's great two ways—in the classroom and during lunchroom duty. We feel he's worth every penny that we're giving him."

Smith, who told reporters earlier in the week that he was going to let his old contract run out and test his worth in the private-school market, seemed pleased with the new deal that reportedly contains a deferred-salary arrangement, an interest-free loan on a New Hampshire ski chalet, and reduced rates on school lunches.

"I wanted to keep an open mind on the private-school offers," said Smith, who looked tan and refreshed after spending his Christmas break in Barbados. "But I'm glad that the school committee saw fit to meet my contract demands—I've always hoped that I could finish my career here in New England."

When asked if he thought teachers' salaries had reached a ridiculous and unjustified new high, Smith explained that for most teachers, the days of earning the really big money were relatively short when compared to the average worker.

"We suffer a lot more stress on a daily basis and the burnout rate in the profession usually means a short career pattern. I have several colleagues who have had to take positions as designated substitutes and they're lucky if they can get a hundred grand a year."

One reporter reminded Smith that it was only a few years ago that teachers were among the lowest paid professionals in the United States, and layoffs were so common that few people were interested in planning a career in education.

Smith tucked his copy of Town and Country under his arm and scratched his ear thoughtfully. "I know what you're saying," he said. "But that was before the days of all the government studies on education. Now we have no-cut contracts and 10-to-1 student-teacher ratios.

"Since they instituted the 'Ten and Five' Rule—10 years in the profession and five in the same school system—we can exercise a veto over any assignment that we don't like, we've got some security now. It's made a lot more people decide to look into teaching as a career."

The superintendent of Regional High was asked if there were any other teachers close to signing new contracts.

"Well, it's early yet," he said. "But I can tell you that we've had meetings with Stanley Terkle, our newest math teacher, and we've made what we feel is a fair offer. Without getting into details, the package has some excellent cash incentives spread over a five-year period. Also we're guaranteed an option clause that says he can take a sabbatical at any time during the length of the contract without loss of pay.

"If we can sign him, we plan to build our curriculum around him," the superintendent continued. "His agent is supposed to get back to us later in the week. You know that last year we lost two excellent physical-education teachers who opted to teach in Japan, and we want to be sure that our offer is competitive. The parents' association and the town finance committee pressed us to offer anything to get Terkle to stay, but we have to be cautious.

"We've still got two English teachers and a media specialist that could be free agents by next September, and we certainly don't want to lose them," he concluded.

All of this information came at the same time that sources in the Metropolitan Public School System were announcing that they had lured highly regarded biology teacher Alan Fernwinkle from Standing Waters High school. Angered by this move, Standing Waters officials have scheduled a news conference for later this week, when they will announce their intention to initiate a suit over what they call "tampering" with members of their veteran staff.

"He's still got two years to go on his contract with us," they explained. "And even though we refused to renegotiate after his classes turned out seven National Merit Scholarship winners last year, Metropolitan had no right to offer what they did."

Even with the loss of Fernwinkle, students at Standing Waters High can still count on one of the best faculties in the area. Also, their school has the territorial draft rights to at least three highly sought area college seniors—two of whom are majoring in the sciences. As one school-committee member put it: "This doesn't mean it will be a building year for us."

"Where will it all end?" one reporter was heard to ask as he walked to his car with a friend. "The public just seems to be so education-crazy that these teachers can practically name their own salary figures."

"I know," said his friend. "But it's just the perverted sense of values in our society today. I guess you have to look at it this way—teachers have been so pampered all of their lives that they've got no sense of reality. Besides, we all know that the could never handle a real job."

With that, Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks, but I do want to say that I would hope that it would be the first order of business of my colleagues in this Congress to put forth a double effort to make sure that those programs we have in place, basic educational opportunity grants, work-study programs, and programs of that nature not be interfered with, and that we take a second look at the needs of teachers.

Yes, this idea of parity in the teaching profession has much to recommend it. It has been important in the past, and all of us do know that only the special and the chosen ended up in the education field, and they were revered and they were respected. But today—and I do not know what the reason for it is—just the opposite has occurred. We do not get the bright students, the exceptional students. Teaching is used as a steppingstone. We do not hear anymore of teachers teaching for 20 or 30 years or for a lifetime.

It is just a step, maybe a passing fancy, and the real dedication as such per se seems to be vanishing.

I would say that the strength of the Nation and I would say the future of every individual, whether he reaches his end, his God-given right to that end, to reach his full capacity and to be what he can be, all has its beginning and depends primarily, if not exclusively, on the fact of who teaches him, how they teach him, how they stimulate his thinking.

So I would think this is a subject matter that all of us should be familiar with in this House. I am sure there are some dedicated Members who are going to make an attempt to gather together all those that have the same feeling and the sensitivity to that subject matter and hopefully we can come up and devise some type of a test that would maybe respond to all those critics as far as the capabilities of teachers are concerned and set together some policy or program which would enable us to guarantee to hold the best and attract the best, because only the best should serve the youth of this Nation in their time of need and that is in their formative years when they start school, kindergarten, and all the way through high school and post secondary.

KING CRIME

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, about 2 years ago I spoke last with respect to the issue that had prompted me to address the House under similar circumstances in special orders with what I called then "The Crime of the Century," notwithstanding the fact that the assassination of President Kennedy certainly would have been rated that way, but the reason and the basis for my describing it as such was that it was resulting in the intimidation of what we called the third branch, but actually the coequal and independent and separate branch known as the Judiciary, and that was the murder of Federal District Judge John W. Wood, followed by the attempted assassination of one of the then assistant Federal district attorneys for the western judicial district, James W. Kerr. The attempted assassination of James Kerr preceded the assassination of Federal Judge John Wood by 6 months, but in that same month and in that same year, 1979, there was another death of a former drug enforcement agency chief in Mexico City, Sante Bario, who died after being in a coma for about 6 months.

Since autumn of 1978 I had been addressing the House, my colleagues, with respect to the attempted assassination of James W. Kerr and predicting that it was not necessary to be a prophet to know that more serious crimes would follow. At that time I was clearly of the opinion that it more likely would be the district attorney himself for the western district at that time, Jamie Boyd. I never dreamed that would be a Federal district judge because it is such a heinous crime. That is the only record we have in the entire history of the Federal judiciary of an out and out assassination of a Federal judge, but I had said as much, as a matter of fact, on the Thursday preceding the assassination of Judge Wood at the beginning of the following week. I had taken the floor and had reported that I had lunch with James Kerr where I met him for the first time here in the House restaurant after he had been brought to Washington in order to be cited for some heroic action, I guess surviving the attempted assassination, by the FBI or the Justice Department.

He asked to meet me and expressed his thanks for having addressed the House consistently for weeks in order to keep some kind of attention on that dastardly crime.

What was not evident here on the national level was that since 1970 I had been going to the local district grand juries and had been reporting what had turned out to be the incremental growth in San Antonio as a way station for the heavy growth of the two-way system, one way going down as stolen automobile vehicles and the return in the way of hard drugs, and marijuana, which became by the time Judge Wood was assassinated a highly sophisticated industry that was bringing in more than a billion dollars a year to the underworld; three very sophisticated mainstreams of this traffic by then had been produced, actually four; one on the east coast in this area, heavy loss of vehicles stolen, transported down to New Orleans, then by way of Houston and to the lower tip of the Texas border into Mexico.

The second and one of the most active was what I called the New York-Chicago-Dallas-Texas-San Antonio and Laredo and Nuevo Laredo line.

Then the third was the Las Vegas-El Paso-Ciavaras, and the fourth was the west coast, LA and the border points, Tijuana and the like.

This traffic continues unabated today. If anything, it has been perfected in its sophistication.

I have called this series of addresses in this Chamber for the record as "King Crime." These I will call the sequela or the second series of "King Crime" because crime is still king in our society. It is so insidious that it goes to the heart of our freedom and our basic societal democracy or participatory democratic processes.

I first spoke out, as I said, in the early 1970's; in fact, in 1970 was my first appearance before the local grand jury, because at that time I felt that it was more of a local problem than anything that I could say involving the national aspect; but when one thing led to another and locally I had stated to the press the existence of this activity and the boldness of the nefarious malefactors who have become so bold that they had with impugnity dispatched half a dozen individuals in San Antonio, without the local police having any ability to control the situation inasmuch as the hit men would cross the border, 4 hours later make the hit in San Antonio, return and across the border and beyond the reach of the local enforcement agents who were puzzled as to the nature of the individuals and the circumstances of their deaths until I was tipped off.

I might point out for the record that, given the background in which I had served as chief juvenile probation officer in their county, I became acquainted not only with the law enforcement agencies, but with that particular element that happened to be in trouble in our society and through the years either relatives or those that later grew up continued and became not only reformatory graduates, but penitentiary graduates, the relationship is still maintained to this day. I probably have more communication and more correspondence from inmates of the penitentiaries than perhaps any other Member in this House. I have never, never dismissed them. I treat them as I do any other constituent; so that by this relationship I learned of some of the reasons and some of the causes and some of the nature of the deaths that were a puzzle to the local police. For that reason I went to the then district attorney. I went to the then grand jury and communicated my knowledge to them.

But when it became obvious that San Antonio was a way station in a newly created flow known as the brown heroin type of traffic emanating from Mexico, which had grown incrementally since the so-called French Connection had been temporarily stopped because of some of their exposures that Sante Bario, who at that time was a New York official, but an expoliceman in Rome, Italy, who ended up in the United States and marrying an American citizen, he eventually, after the exposure in his part of the French Connection, left New York, perhaps for safekeeping, and came to Washington where for a while he worked here on the Hill. And then later he ended up working for the newly formed DEA—the Drug Enforcement Agency.

Ultimately he was dispatched to Mexico City. At the same time that this was happening, these other events were taking place, including the nefarious pattern of activity of the famous Corrasco, which nationally perhaps is forgotten but locally not, because this man, surnamed Corrasco, was really one of those that had built up quite a bit of an operation in which San Antonio, which I say and repeat, was really a way station. San Antonio was not a producing headquarters, an operational headquarters, but it was a way station. And with the development of this two-way 1-day in dollar and now almost $2 billion traffic, it was impossible, as I told the grand jury, to have this kind of activity, the kind of crime we have in our country, unfettered, untrammeled, where the criminal walks with his head high, walks in the streets, and the victims are terrorized, such as our judges and Federal judicial officials were there for a period of about 3 years in which it cost more than a million dollars to the Government in special outlays just for protective custody through the U.S. marshals.

Now, what point have we reached? The sorry thing is that even after the exposure of these cases the mystery of the Sante Bario case is still unraveled, and at this time, and this is preceding the death of Judge Wood, I said there was a relationship between the then known Sante Bario case and its development at that point and what led to the attempted assassination of James Kerr as well as the ultimate assassination of Judge Wood.

It seems so far fetched that some ridiculed what I was saying. Some even tried to make it look as if the only motive I could have was publicity of some kind. Yet there was not. I was not issuing press releases. I never have. And my staff limitations are such that I must of necessity address myself extemporaneously.

Therefore, persisting, as I did, and then unfortunately having the verification of my fears as I communicated to James Kerr on that fateful Thursday preceding on that following Tuesday the death, assassination of John Wood, and learning for the first time that Judge Wood had dismissed as of 3 months before his custodial protectors, the U.S. marshals, I begged Mr. Kerr to return immediately and urged Judge Wood to recall the marshals. I said even though I think perhaps the district attorney is in greater danger, the judge is acting very foolishly. I said I hoped the other judges have not. And he said no. As a matter of fact, the other judges still have U.S. marshal surveillance. I said. "Please, I beg of you, Mr. Kerr, go back, and the first thing you do is get ahold of Judge Wood and tell him I urge him."

He said, "Well, I am here to thank you both for myself and for Judge Wood. As a matter of fact, he has requested a picture of you. He wants to hang it in his office."

Now there certainly could not have been any partisanship, even though that was injected later when I introduced a resolution that the sense of the House would be that the President divert $3 million solely and exclusively for the purpose of the Justice Department being able to offer a reward for the definite information that would ultimately lead to the unraveling of the case. I felt that it was very involved. But I felt that it was such a tremendous national issue that I must bring it to the attention of my colleagues at that time.

Today I do so because while Sante Bario's death was enshrouded in this mystery, here is a permanent DEA agent, so highly thought of that he was made quickly the head of the Mexico City operations, suddenly arrested in San Antonio, charged with having received a bribe. And from whom? From the most notorious and one of the most insidious human elements I have ever read of, a man by the name of Pico, who is not only a double agent, he is a triple and quadruple agent, but had associations with Sante Bario in New York at the time of the French Connection exposure. And lo and behold, he showed up in Mexico City and lo and behold, suddenly it is announced, with a great deal of headline news, that this DEA agent in charge of the Mexico operations, is under arrest and incarcerated in San Antonio.

The first 3 weeks he was sent 80 miles above San Antonio to Gillespie County for safekeeping, but then his attorney intervened with the court and said it was not fair to his client to be removed from the quick and ready counsel of his attorney. So they brought him back to the Bexar County Jail in San Antonio where Corrasco had been held, and where I had been tipped off that when Corrasco was in prison in the county jail he had been given special consideration by being allowed conjugal visits and the use of a telephone. And I was tipped off that he was using the telephone in the county jail to transact further drug business.

So then I contacted the then district attorney at the time, and the district attorney attempted to do something, when lo and behold, Corrasco's lawyer goes before a district judge with a writ of habeas corpus and demands that as a matter of judicial decree Corrasco be safeguarded in those privileges.

This was the same Corrasco that after he was convicted and went to the Federal penitentiary, and was transported from the Bexar County Jail, held himself, himself up, held three hostages who were killed, made the national news at the time, because when they were attempted to be recaptured by the authorities they died in the process. Corrasco was part and parcel of an organizational attempt that in effect was less than the middle ground in its operation. But it was an integral part of this far vaster operation. He had residual inheritors who are still around to this day.

But the fact that shocked me was that even in the county jail there would be such a corrupt situation that these kinds of privileges would be permitted, that this kind of activity would be permitted, and that it would take a U.S. Congressman to go back to the district in order to inform the local officials of what was going on.

All of this I had spread on the record at the time. I was also denounced at the time. And if the records are searched, and when Corrasco was holding himself off with the hostages, his lawyer was sent up there to try to mediate, and Corrasco went out of his way to use my name and curse me. For what reason? Obviously because maybe in the course of my speaking out something had happened.

So then Sante Bario is returned to the county jail from Gillespie County.

He has not been there 24 hours when he is given a peanut butter and jelly sandwich and immediately thereafter goes into convulsions and then into a coma which he never came out of and died 6 months later.

Now they claim he was sick or something and he got those convulsions. Well, if anybody is ready to believe in the tooth fairy and in Cinderella and all the other fairy tales, then you can believe that one.

The fact is that Berry was never tried, he never faced his accusers. The DEA which has indulged, like many other law enforcement agencies, in what I consider to be unacceptable standards of behavior, that is they have to go cheek by jowl to deal with the criminal element of the most sophisticated kind in order to do business to try to eradicate crime. Well, that never has happened and it never will.

But this has been happening from the highest levels, the CIA, where unaccountable runaway, no human individual or collection of individuals is good enough, strong enough, sound enough that it can have unrestricted, unaccountable power for long without corruption. That is true of our agencies themselves.

We have seen cases where the Senate committee has brought out in testimony where the highly thought of CIA goes in and deals with the most sophisticated criminal elements in our society; with this tremendous power inherent in these criminal elements and malefactors in our society who today have possession of shopping malls, banks, otherwise honest business endeavors; and the point has been reached where our society is deeply poisoned.

So that if crime continues to be the real issue that is agitating our citizens, and anybody in minimal contact with his citizenry will tell you that is the No. 1 issue, the fear of crime, the fear of assault, the fear of personal life. Why shouldn't the criminals feel that they could kill a Federal judge and get away with it? As a matter of fact, the reason I resumed that discussion is because I left off at the time the indictments were finally brought, not until 2½ years after speaking out, and not without criticism.

I did everything under the sun. I even tried to reach the President of the United States then, James Carter. The best I could do was to end up with his special assistant, Eizenstat, in my office who brought their special assistant liaison with DEA. But I could not get them to give that crime priority.

Then when Judge Wood was assassinated there was a flurry, yes; but then the case started to fade away into the dust of history like Jimmy Hoffa faded away into the dust. Who today remembers Jimmy Hoffa?

Yet I believe, of course, that there is an old saying that says, "Murder will out;" yes, it will, but in the meanwhile our society must, if it seeks its salvation and preservation as a viable society, what good is a government if it cannot even ensure personal safety to its citizens, if it cannot ensure safety of life and protection of life, limb, and property?

If the criminal element has become so bold, so strong that it can infiltrate every layer of our Government and with impunity direct massive billion dollar businesses of a corrupt nature, of a criminal, criminal nature, with impunity. It is necessary then that I resume because at the time I settled for the indictments; and I had the great honor of being called 5 hours before the indictments were publicized, by the Director of the FBI, Judge Webster, down there in my district, in my home, San Antonio, to merely thank me, giving me credit for having been responsible, having kept that case under the attention of, on the front burner, so to speak, and he wanted me to be the first to know that they would be bringing in indictments that would be released in 5 hours' time.

I then said that I would not speak out because the legal processes would be working but that if the investigation or the results of the prosecution were truncated, I would be heard from again.

I rise today and I ask that in the RECORD at this point there be printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Washington Post of last week, Thursday, entitled "The Narc Who Loved Her", a report, an extensive special feature article on the widow of Sante Bario, a book which she has just published.

Also as exhibit 2 a copy of the Associated Press report of the 16th of this month with the dateline in New Orleans in which it is announced that the conviction of Elizabeth Chagra was one of several who had been indicted in connection with the murder of Judge Wood, that this particular conviction had been overturned by one of the appellate courts. There remains another conviction of a lesser gravity that still was upheld but the main one, a 30-year conviction, was overturned by the court.

It is interesting to note that the defense lawyer says that it is his hope the Government will drop it because he hopes the Government will not go out and spend another $1 million in prosecution.

What a sorry, sorry justification for nonprosecution.

As exhibit 3 I would like to present for the RECORD at this time the article carrying today, Tuesday, February 19, by Jack Anderson, entitled "New Light Shed on DEA Agent's Death."

The documents follow:

THE NARC WHO LOVED HER—JOANNE BARIO'S TALE OF SECRETS, PASSION AND DEATH

(By Phil McCombs)

This is about love and death and a girl from Falls Church who married a bold, passionate, dashing man in an effort to find herself.

"Talk about being on a high," says Joanne Bario, 38. "I mean, we would walk into a room and people would turn and stare at us. We had it: that energy, that intensity, what romance is all about. I wanted that . . . I didn't want to live in quiet desperation."

But her "fantasy of a romantic dream" became, she says, "the hardest kind of reality." Her 1975 marriage to a highly decorated U.S. narcotics agent, Sante A. Bario, plunged her directly into what is romantic and violent in 20th-century America.

"Women want adventure," she says, "and the way they traditionally get it is through men . . . Because who was I, really? A sort of Jane Doe. I was this sort of pretty, intense, passionate girl who wanted to have something happen in my life."

"Fatal Dreams," the book in which she tells her story, billed by Dial Press as a true story of undercover narcotics work in Mexico. Its publication comes as U.S.-backed Mexican officials are waging bloody warfare against drug traffickers; a U.S. agent abducted in Guadalajara last Thursday is presumed dead.

The book recounts the odyssey of another U.S. agent, Sante Bario, a man from Italy who married two American women, won success in the drug wars and died in a Texas prison.

In fact, "Fatal Dreams" is a love story.

Joanne Bario says, "It's about fame and women and the failure to love . . . What it's like to be a woman unfolding. I think I sort of grew up buying this whole story—I wanted to meet a man who would change my life, and I did! I met a man who permanently and irrevocably changed my life. And I went off with him, and it was a big risk, and I took it.

"And it wasn't like it was supposed to be."

Their life together ended in horror and death. Pregnant and living in Mexico City, Joanne watched her man disintegrate under the pressure of cracking big international drug cases. In 1978 Sante Bario was arrested for allegedly taking a bribe. One night, he went into convulsions; some suspect he'd been poisoned, though the autopsy said otherwise. Before he died, he spent four months plugged into machines, braindead, nurses flipping him like a flapjack every half hour to prevent bed sores.

The last time she saw him in a San Antonio hospital, Joanne Bario writes, "He was old and white and frail. He had, my mother said, rushed through our lives like a powerful wind in a summer storm. He'd carried me away completely. On his arm on our wedding day, I was sure I had been rescued and lifted out of dailiness, that I was where I wanted to be, part of Sandy's living theater."

She has dark hair, deep brown eyes, a low-key manner. Grew up middle-class, wanted to be a writer. Needed material, a life, an identity.

Sante Bario, a policeman, had come to America in the early '60s. His first wife, Patricia Bario, speaks with restraint and dignity of a difficult time: "He was trying very hard to establish his identity in an adopted country. When he and I met in 1960 [in Rome], he didn't speak English and I didn't speak Italian. We used to write notes to each other and then translate them with our little dictionaries . . ."

When Pat and Sante Bario married, she was a Detroit newspaper reporter (she was later to join Burson-Marsteller, the public relations firm, and to serve briefly as Geraldine Ferraro's press secretary during the presidential campaign). Sante Bario became an undercover IRS man. His climb began: 23 racketeers arrested in Boston, 28 mobsters jailed in New Orleans. By the early '70s, Bario was an agent with the Drug Enforcement Administration, making a name for himself. He sometimes had so many undercover identities, his widow says, that he would wake up in a cold sweat wondering where, and who, he was.

Bario was charming, loving, funny, and—in his work—eager, ambitious. Joanne Bario says, "He saw himself as a kind of White Knight slaying dragons." He met her at a New York dinner party in 1972, at a time when his marriage to Patricia was going bad. Joanne Tumolo was 10 years younger and of Italian background. And she was hungry for romance.

From the beginning, she found herself wondering what was real, what imagined, "He was so captivating," she says, "you'd get caught in all that and you couldn't dig through it." As he declared his love, she watched him in a bar mirror. "It was easier watching his mirror image than watching Sandy himself lean close, stroke my hand . . . I saw in that mirror a 36-year-old adventurer who knew the world, four languages, whom women always fell for. But I couldn't figure out what he saw in me."

He saw, perhaps, a "fresh . . . woman" with whom he could make a dreamed-of new life.

In writing, Joanne Bario had to wrestle with the identity question. In assuming undercover and other life roles, she wondered, "How do you pretend you're someone you're not? How could I bring the two parts of him [the undercover and the DEA bureaucrat] together? . . . How does he remain connected to his core self? It seems to me a big issue is, is there a core self? Is there something that endures in us, in all our relations to people, in all our 'identities'?

"I was very interested in this when I met Sandy. I was young. I was trying to decide who I was."

She also says this:

"I wonder if Sandy is real to me any more. If he's become fictional. If he's, you know, like a character now.

She thinks.

"There was a part of me that said, 'In order to be a writer, things had to happen to you.' I wanted experiences. I didn't think of the consequences. I didn't believe the consequences.

"So that part of me saw it as experience. I don't know if I say it as material, but, 'This is the world.'

"Then there was the part of me that really responded emotionally to Sandy . . . I was in therapy then. My therapist said, 'This is a fantasy. You'll have to examine this fantasy.' I said to her, 'I don't care of it's a fantasy, because it's a fantasy I want and I'm gonna have it!' "

She is hard on herself in the book. Paints herself as whining, unhappy, demanding.

"I knew he loved me . . . But why did I marry him? . . . Did I want to write this book?

"I loved him, but I was also much more doubtful about . . . this marriage, I was tough on him. I think he wanted me to write about him. I don't think it was an accident that he married two women who were writers."

By the end, she wrote, "I didn't want to believe he had kept so many secrets from me . . . Sandy was a man who had known too much, and I was a woman who hadn't known him at all."

She wrote the book to get it out of her system. Felt, as she wrote, love, hatred, fury.

In Mexico City in 1975, Bario's DEA unit was under pressure from Washington to produce big cases. Joanne, newly wed and pregnant, hadn't much liked the scene. She hadn't liked the agents, the "narcs." Many were alcoholics. "They wore cowboy boots, they were terrible to their wives."

In 1978, she writes, her husband, under the pressure to produce, looked the other way when an informant, "Claude Picault," sold drugs as a sideline. To have blown the whistle would have ruined the case. It was a fatal mistake. Picault told DEA that Bario had taken a bribe from him. For whatever reasons, the informant was believed and his boss arrested.

For Joanne Bario, everything was different.

"I was angry at him," she says. "He was in jail and he expected me to help him. He was leaning on me completely, [saying] 'You have to decide what to do.' And I felt, 'Wait a minute, that wasn't the bargain. You were supposed to be the knight on the white horse. I was supposed to be carried away.' Suddenly everything was reversed. I wanted to save him . . . but it was his world, and I couldn't. It was all about drugs and lawyers and judges . . .

"I felt I was going to come to terms with him if it killed me. And I did. I feel closure now. Regardless of what happens with this book, I'd like somebody to look at DEA.

Also, I feel I'm ending this part of my life. I own it. I've owned up to it. It was humiliating. I was ashamed, I guess. My husband died in jail. It was not something to be proud of. I had to learn to accept it."

She thinks that her husband broke the law in overlooking Picault's alleged drug-dealing, but that Picault's—and DEA's—charges against him were in all probability false.

This view is shared by a lawyer friend she retained to sue DEA after her husband's death, former Watergate prosecutor Richard Ben-Veniste. He obtained a post mortem job reinstatement for Bario which entitled the agent's widow and children to insurance and other benefits. Through the discovery process, he learned facts that convinced him Bario was innocent and raised questions about the behavior of agency officials:

DEA paid Picault $50,000 to make the case against Bario.

After Bario's arrest, the agency learned that Picault had run a smuggling operation involving the same cocaine that Picault had claimed earlier he had sold together with Bario.

The agency also learned that Picault had asked an individual to falsely testify against Bario in the impending trial.

Knowing these things declined to prosecute Picault.

Bario was dead before the case could come to trial. Some say he was poisoned by any one of dozens of drug traffickers or others who had it in for him; an autopsy found that he had choked on a peanut butter sandwich.

"DEA is a real dangerous organization as far as I'm concerned," says Joanne Bario.

"Conduct far below what we would expect of a government agency," says Ben-Veniste.

Asked to comment on Ben-Veniste's list, a DEA spokesman said this week, "We are going to decline getting into that kind of rebuttal, at least until we've read the book."

Now Joanne Bario, the writer, the pretty woman dressed in black, sits in her red-brick rambler in suburban Kensington.

With her two children—an 8-year-old son by Sandy, a 2-year-old daughter by a second husband she married on the rebound, then divorced.

With her new novel, about love, in progress.

In downtown Washington, Patricia Bario is reached by phone at Burson-Marsteller. Says, "Obviously, no one as close as I was to him could have read that book without crying through every page of it."

The book paints a bleak picture of the first marriage. Bario—not yet successful and famous—"couldn't compete with his wife. She was four years older and rooted in her Senate PR job. She outearned him, outclouted him, and outspoke him in her mother tongue." On trips home, "He would visit, argue with his wife, and leave again . . . He admitted he had chosen his work to escape his marriage."

The writer, Joanne Bario, says, "I tried to be really discreet in the book."

Patricia Bario says, "When I fell in love with him he wasn't a distinguished international undercover agent. He was just a very special person. Of course, there were hundreds of people who fell in love with him once he was here and established."

The two women agree on one thing: that Sante Bario told his second wife that his first marriage was unhappy.

"Judging from what I know of Patricia now, I think that's what he needed to believe," says Joanne.

"I'm sure he told it that way," says Patricia. "It's easiest to tell it that way when the marriage is over. But if he was leaving in '64 to escape our marriage, then where did this child come from that was born in '69?"

Patricia had two children with Sandy Bario. The first, Franco, 23, is an aspiring independent television producer here.

"To me," says Franco, "I see Joanne as a woman who discovered a man who was larger than life, and she saw the relationship as a way to be married and swept away from the real world and be brought into this other world, this more exciting, more intense world. But it wasn't real."

Franco remembers his father well.

"One time in the car, driving back to my mother's house, he was distraught about the pressures. Sometimes he would be just a little kid ready to play kickball on the lawn. You can imagine what was going on in his mind: he's got three or four other lives going that don't involve his children or wife. He told me how much he loved me and he hoped I wouldn't get into his line of work because there are a lot of other ways to make a living.

"But he was scared and didn't know any other way. He actually did say, 'It will kill you.' "

Her novel-in-progress:

"The thing about romantic fantasy," says Joanne Bario, "it's like catching that gold ring, It's the part of you that allows yourself to not be reasonable, to . . . believe that there's more out there, now, 'If I just dare, I can have it all.' And that's what Americans want. I think it's part of our culture."

The Romantic Fantasy.

"The boy-girl thing is the only part of our lives where we allow our emotions any free play. The rest of our lives are so tight. We don't take risks . . . This is sort of what my second book is about: failures of love, what would happen if we let go."

Her mother used to tell her, "When you can accept that your life isn't going to be normal, accept it and you'll be a lot happier. Stop feeling that a part of you has got to fit in."

She remarried in 1980. It lasted two years.

"After Sandy died I felt real desperate about men . . . I was 32 years old and I was just enveloped by death. I married a city planner. He was the first man I went out with after Sandy died, and I felt alive. And I misconstrued that for love . . .

"He left. I made him feel inadequate . . . He wanted a routine, a sense of stability. I was always flying off and saying, 'Well, what can we do now that will be exciting and fun?' . . . It was hard for him to imagine this book coming out and him being married to me. And now I have this book, and a beautiful 2-year-old daughter and a checkered past which I never imagined I would have."

She laughs.

Says she has no boyfriend.

"I'm not going looking for him."

Pauses.

"That is an enormous feeling of freedom for me, by the way. I don't feel desperate to find somebody tomorrow."

Would she do it again?

"Yes, I would . . . I've gone through this whole thing and learned nothing! [Sandy] was a one-and-only . . . who wanted to make more of life, to be connected with life."

Thinks.

"Is there supposed to be an answer? There's no answer in my book. Did he take a bribe? Was he murdered? So what? What it's about is a unique person. I never expect to meet someone like Sandy again. And I didn't want him to die with this false image of 'Narc Murdered in Cell.' He's what we all are, only more theatrically. He had what we all have, a hundred different parts of him! He was compelling, very human, he was moral . . .

"I wanted to lift his death up and make it count. That's all."

APPEALS COURT OVERTURNS ELIZABETH CHAGRA'S CONSPIRACY CONVICTION

(By Bill Crider)

NEW ORLEANS.—After Elizabeth Chagra's conviction on charges she plotted a Federal judge's assassination was overturned, her lawyer predicted she may win her freedom soon because the government might want to avoid another costly trial.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Friday that her conviction cannot stand because a jury was instructed improperly by the presiding judge concerning what it would have to conclude to find her guilty.

The three-judge panel let stand the murder conviction of Charles Harrelson, who pulled the trigger to kill Judge Jon H. Wood, Jr. outside his San Antonio, Texas, condominium in 1979.

The appeals court also left intact Mrs. Chagra's conviction of tax fraud and conspiring to obstruct justice in the investigation into Wood's death, which resulted in a five-year prison term as part of her 30-year sentence. The court also upheld the conviction of Harrelson's wife, Jo Ann, for conspiring to obstruct justice.

"I am hopeful, I really, really am, that this time around, everything will be straightened out," Mrs. Chagra, 31, said in a telephone interview with the Associated Press from the federal women's prison in Alderson, W. Va.

Galveston lawyer Warren Burnett said he has "no idea when (a new trial might be conducted for Mrs. Chagra) or whether the government would want to go to the millions of dollars of expense to do that."

In the meantime, he told the El Paso Times, he will try to win her release on bail "now that she's been locked away from her children for almost three years."

Burnett said his client probably has served enought time already to win parole for the convictions on lesser charges. U.S. Attorney Helen Eversberg, whose jurisdiction includes San Antonio and El Paso, said she was "very pleased with the affirmed conviction of the hit man, Mr. Harrelson" but unsure whether the government will seek another trial for Chagra.

Mrs. Chagra's husband Jimmy was acquitted in a separate trial of charges he paid Harrelson $250,000 to kill Wood, known as "Maximum John" for the stiff sentences he dealt drug dealers. Chagra was convicted, however, of conspiring to obstruct the investigation.

Wood was killed by a single shot to the back from a high-powered rifle on May 29, 1979, shortly before he was scheduled to preside over the Chagras' drug smuggling trial. The indictment said Chagra feared Wood would sentence him to life in prison on a criminal enterprise charge.

The murder, the only killing of a federal judge this century, spawned the largest federal investigation since the 1963 assassination of President John F. Kennedy.

NEW LIGHT SHED ON DEA AGENT'S DEATH

(By Jack Anderson)

Long-suppressed evidence sheds new light on the mysterious death of a decorated Drug Enforcement Administration agent six years ago, and on the dubious techniques the drug agency used to go after him.

The agent, Sante Bario, suffered a seizure in a San Antonio jail cell in 1979, lapsed into a coma and died several months later without regaining consciousness.

He had been arrested and was awaiting trial after a DEA informant charged that he had paid Bario $9,000 to be allowed to keep five kilos of cocaine involved in an undercover operation.

Accordingly to the official account of his death, Bario choked on a peanut butter sandwich. But initial tests reportedly showed traces of poison in his system.

Bario's widow, Joanne, told my associate Donald Goldberg that her husband was merely holding the money as a favor for the informant, who was afraid his girlfriend would get it. The widow will tell her story in a book, "Fatal Dreams," that is to be published this month.

The case against Bario depended entirely on the informant's word. A tape recording he claimed to have made of the bribe transaction turned out to be blank. The marked bills remained intact in Bario's safe, according to the widow.

A federal judge ordered Bario's posthumous reinstatement, thus securing the widow her survivor benefits, but she wants to clear her husband's name once and for all. New documents, uncovered by her attorney, former Watergate prosecutor Richard Ben-Veniste, point to self-serving motivation on the informant's part to set Bario up for a fall: He was not only paid generously by DEA, but was promised help in gaining American citizenship.

What did the DEA know about the informant? He had talked a buddy of his, Alain Chaillou, into running a smuggling errand for him, claiming it was a DEA operation.

The informant had left a 1.9-kilo stash of cocaine in Mexico, and could not retrieve it for fear of his underworld enemies there. So he got Chaillou to pick it up and take it to Bogota, Colombia, promising that he would have DEA protection.

Instead, Chaillou was arrested at the Bogota airport. The informant called DEA with a cock-and-bull story, then left Chaillou twisting in the wind. The U.S. and Colombian authorties would not swallow his story that he was smuggling drugs for the DEA.

Eventually, one DEA investigator became convinced that Chaillou was telling the truth and concluded in a written report that the arrest "was the direct result of Chaillou's entrapment."

Despite the evidence of the informant's illicit behavior, the U.S. attorney in Puerto Rico, where the informant lived, told the DEA he "did not feel there was sufficient evidence to indict." The prosecutor said he could have gotten an indictment against the informant, but that "the evidence simply wasn't enough to convict."

As to why the DEA was out to get one of its top agents, the speculation is that Bario knew too much about certain questionable DEA practices that were under investigation at the time.

Now I rise because both the Anderson article happened to do with Sante Bario's mysterious death and the book written by his widow, leave much to be desired even though enough is said there that appears to be new.

Most of that we have brought out and it was the reason I was motivated to speak out of the Sante Bario case.

I finally stopped because I did everything I could to try to see if after the DEA considered the case closed that we could get the Justice Department to investigate the circumstances involving the DEA's own role in that case.

I had good reason to know then, as I do now, that had Sante Bario ever reached the point where he could have defended himself or testify, his testimony would have involved, very embarrassingly, the agency itself and that among other things he would have talked for the first time about the existence of this heavily growing traffic that at that time was growing exponentially in the Las Vegas-El Paso-Mexico connection.

Also, coincidental with all of this speaking out, first locally, on my prediction that some agents of law enforcement were going to be hurt because nothing was being done to restrain those who got bolder. If they could knock off seven individuals with impunity, why shouldn't they knock off a lesser law enforcement agent who might get in their way? Eventually, why not teach a lesson by killing a judge who had been, in their estimation, unduly severe in assessing punishment to narcotics and dope peddlers.

These were the motivations, and today I rise to bring out what right now appears to be something new and novel, but which we had brought out even in the record, and also to report that until and unless, even the Wood murder is fully followed through, yes, the trigger man was flushed out; the middle man was flushed out.

What about the heads of the syndicates? What about the heads that really—well, they even reached the point where one of the lawyers for Chagra was a personal attorney for Meyer Lansky, the big syndicate founder and head who died last year or year before that.

That does not mean that with his demise the syndicate has demised; it does not mean that this level of sophisticated crime has not infiltrated every crevice and nook and cranny of our society; it does not mean that they have stopped infiltrating every single layer of our enforcement agencies and our government, from the highest to the lowest; it just means America has a continuing challenge.

Back in the days of Al Capone, our leading criminologists and law enforcement people invited a distinguished British criminologist to come and study our situation and see what he could recommend.

He did not stay here 3 weeks; and he said "Gentlemen, what you are asking me is actually impossible until you do one thing first." And they said, "What is that?"—"Until you can separate the connection between your authorities, your Government, and the criminal, it is futile for me to be here. When you have done that, then call me and I might be able to advise on the question of crime."

Today I want to announce that this will be the beginning of what will follow in an attempt to clarify not only the Sante Bario death, which is in desperate need of clarification, but also to point out that with the reversal of the conviction of Elizabeth Chagras, that the job must be done, to continue to explore ways to find these connections, disgorge them, prosecute them, and not let our society continue to be victimized by the criminal element.

King Crime still remains supreme. He is undisturbed, with his scepter of command. And I think it is to the shame and to the harm of our society.

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS FOR THE 99TH CONGRESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the requirement of clause 2(a) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, I submit herewith the rules of the Committee on Ways and Means for the 99th Congress and ask that they be printed in the RECORD at this point. These rules were adopted by the committee in an open session on February 6, 1985.

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS FOR THE 99TH CONGRESS

Rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, provides in part:

• • • The Rules of the House are the rules of its committees and subcommittees so far as applicable, except that a motion to recess from day to day is a motion of high privilege in committees and subcommittees.

• • • Each subcommittee of a committee is a part of that committee, and is subject to the authority and direction of that committee and to its rules as far as applicable.

• • • Each standing committee of the House shall adopt written rules governing its procedure. Such rules • • •

(1) shall be adopted in a meeting which is open to the public • • •

(2) shall be not inconsistent with the Rules of the House or with those provisions of law having the force and effect of Rules of the House • • •

In accordance with the foregoing, the Committee on Ways and Means, on February 6, 1985, adopted the following as the Rules of the Committee for the 99th Congress.

RULE 1. IN GENERAL

Except where the terms "full Committee" and "subcommittee" are specifically referred to, the following rules shall apply to the Committee on Ways and Means and its subcommittees as well as to the respective chairmen.

RULE 2. MEETING DATE, QUORUM, AND QUORUM FOR TAKING TESTIMONY AND EVIDENCE

The regular meeting day of the Committee on Ways and Means shall be on the second Wednesday of each month while the House is in session. A majority of the Committee constitutes a quorum for business. Provided, however, that two members shall constitute a quorum at any regularly scheduled hearing called for the purpose of taking testimony and receiving evidence.

RULE 3. SUBCOMMITTEE MEETINGS

Insofar as possible, meetings of the Committee and its subcommittees shall not conflict. Subcommittee chairmen shall set meeting dates after consultation with the Chairman and other subcommittee chairmen with a view toward avoiding simultaneous scheduling of Committee and subcommittee meetings or hearings wherever possible.

RULE 4. SUBCOMMITTEES

All matters referred to the Committee on Ways and Means involving the Internal Revenue Code, except those revenue measures referred to Subcommittees under paragraphs 1, 2, 3 or 5, shall be considered by the whole Committee and not in subcommittee.

There shall be six standing subcommittees as follows: Subcommittee on Social Security; Subcommittee on Health; Subcommittee on Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation; Subcommittee on Trade; Subcommittee on Select Revenue Measures; and Subcommittee on Oversight.

The jurisdiction of such subcommittees includes:

1. Subcommittee on Social Security shall consist of 11 Members 7 of whom shall be Democrats and 4 of whom shall be Republicans.

In general, the jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on Social Security includes bills and matters referred to the Committee on Ways and Means which relate to the Federal Old-Age, Survivors' and Disability Insurance System, the Railroad Retirement System, and employment taxes and trust fund operations relating to those systems. The jurisdiction of this subcommittee, more specifically, includes bills and matters involving title II of the Social Security Act and Chapter 22 of the Internal Revenue Code (the Railroad Retirement Tax Act), as well as provisions in title VII and title XI of the Act relating to procedure and administration involving the Old-Age, Survivors' and Disability Insurance System.

2. Subcommittee on Health shall consist of 11 Members, 7 of whom shall be Democrats and 4 of whom shall be Republicans.

In general, the jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on Health includes bills and matters which are referred to the Committee on Ways and Means which relate to programs which provide payments (from any source) for health care, health delivery systems, or health research. More specifically, the jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on Health includes bills and matters which relate to the health care programs of the Social Security Act (including titles V, XI (Part B), XVIII, and XIX thereof) and, concurrent with the full Committee, tax credit and deduction provisions of the Internal Revenue Code dealing with health insurance premiums and health care costs.

3. Subcommittee on Select Revenue Measures shall consist of 11 Members, 7 of whom shall be Democrats and 4 of whom shall be Republicans.

The jurisdiction of this subcommittee shall consist of those revenue measures which, from time to time, shall be referred to it specifically by the Chairman of the full Committee.

4. Subcommittee on Trade shall consist of 14 Members, 9 of whom shall be Democrats and 5 of whom shall be Republicans.

In general, the jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on Trade includes bills and matters referred to the Committee on Ways and Means which relate to: customs and customs administration including tariff and import fee structure, classification, valuation of and special rules applying to imports, and special tariff provisions and procedures which relate to customs operation affecting exports and imports; import trade matters including import impact, industry relief from injurious imports, adjustment assistance and programs to encourage competitive responses to imports, unfair import practices including antidumping and countervailing duty provisions, and import policy which relates to dependence on foreign sources of supply; commodity agreements and reciprocal trade agreements including multilateral and bilateral trade negotiations and implementation of agreement involving tariff and nontariff trade barriers to and distortions of international trade; international rules, organizations and institutional aspects of international trade agreements; budget authorizations for the U.S. Customs Service, the U.S. International Trade Commission, and U.S. Trade Representative; and special trade-related problems involving market access, competitive conditions of specific industries, export policy and promotion, access to materials in short supply, bilateral trade relations including trade with developing countries, operations of multinational corporations, and trade with non-market economies.

5. Subcommittee on Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation shall consist of 8 Members, 5 of whom shall be Democrats and 3 whom shall be Republicans.

In general, the jurisdiction of this subcommittee includes bills and matters referred to the Committee on Ways and Means which relate to the public assistance provisions of the Social Security Act including welfare reform, supplemental security income, aid to families with dependent children, social services, child support, eligibility of welfare recipients for food stamps, and low-income energy assistance.

More specifically, the jurisdiction of this subcommittee includes bills and matters relating to titles I, IV, VI, X, XIV, XVI, XVII, XX and related provisions of titles VII and XI of the Social Security Act.

The jurisdiction of this subcommittee also includes bills and matters referred to the Committee on Way and Means which relate to the Federal-State system of unemployment compensation, and the financing thereof, including the programs for extended and emergency benefits.

More specifically, the jurisdiction of this subcommittee includes all bills and matters pertaining to the programs of unemployment compensation under titles III, IX and XII of the Social Security Act, Chapters 23 and 23A of the Internal Revenue Code, the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970, the Emergency Unemployment Compensation Act of 1974, and provisions relating thereto.

6. Subcommittee on Oversight shall consist of 11 Members, 7 of whom shall be Democrats and 4 of whom shall be Republicans.

The jurisdiction of this subcommittee includes all matter within the scope of the Committee but shall be limited to existing law and said oversight jurisdiction shall not be exclusive but shall be concurrent with that of the other subcommittees, and with respect to matters involving the Internal Revenue Code said concurrent jurisdiction shall be shared with the full Committee. Before undertaking any investigation or hearing, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Oversight shall confer with the Chairman of the full Committee and the chairman of any other subcommittee having jurisdiction.

RULE 5. SUBCOMMITTEE CHAIRMEN

Democratic members of the Committee shall have the right in order of full Committee seniority to bid for vacant subcommittee chairmanships. Such bids shall be subject to approval by a majority of those present and voting in the Democratic caucus of the Committee. If the caucus rejects a subcommittee chairmanship bid, the next senior Democratic Member may bid for the position as in the first instance. No member of the Committee who serves on the Budget Committee shall serve as a chairman of a subcommittee. A subcommittee chairmanship shall not be considered vacant while the subcommittee chairman has taken a leave of absence to serve on the Budget Committee.

RULE 6. EX-OFFICIO MEMBERS OF SUBCOMMITTEES

The Chairman and the ranking minority member may sit as ex-officio members of all subcommittees. They may be counted for purposes of assisting in the establishment of a quorum for a subcommittee. However, their absence shall not count against the establishment of a quorum by the regular members of the subcommittee. Ex-officio members shall neither vote in the subcommittee nor be taken into consideration for purposes of determining the ratio of the subcommittee.

RULE 7. REFERENCE OF LEGISLATION AND SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT

Every bill, or other matter (except bills concerning the Internal Revenue Code) referred to the Committee or initiated by the Committee shall be referred by the Chairman of the full Committee to the appropriate subcommittee within 2 weeks from the date of its receipt by the Committee unless by a majority vote in the full Committee, consideration is to be by the full Committee. A subcommittee shall, within 3 legislative days of receipt of a bill referral, acknowledge same to the full Committee.

After a bill has been pending in a subcommittee for a reasonable period of time, the Chairman of the full Committee may make a request in writing to the subcommittee that the subcommittee forthwith report the bill to the full Committee with its recommendations. If within 7 legislative days after the Chairman's written request, the subcommittee has not so reported the bill, then there shall be in order in the full Committee a motion to discharge the subcommittee from further consideration of the bill. If such motion is approved by a majority vote in the full Committee, the bill may thereafter be considered only by the full Committee.

No bill reported by a subcommittee shall be considered by the full Committee unless it has been presented to all members at least 2 legislative days prior to the meeting, together with a comparison with present law, a section-by-section analysis of the proposed change, a section-by-section justification, and a draft statement of the costs of carrying out the bill that is consistent with the requirements for reported bills under clause 7 of Rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

RULE 8. SUPERVISION, DUTIES OF COMMITTEE STAFF

The staff of the Committee, both professional and clerical, shall be under the general supervision and direction of the Chairman of the full Committee except as provided in clause 5(d) and clause 6 of Rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives concerning committee expenses and staff. Provided, however, that the chairman of each subcommittee shall be entitled to select and designate at least one professional staff member for said subcommittee and at least one clerical staff member for said subject to the approval of a majority of the Democratic members of said full Committee. The ranking minority member shall have the right to designate one staff member. Said staff members shall be compensated at a salary commensurate with the responsibilities prescribed by said subcommittee chairman. Compensation shall be provided out of appropriated amounts—rather than statutory amounts allowed each committee.

RULE 9. COMMITTEE BUDGET AND EXPENSES

The Chairman, in consultation with the majority members of the Committee, shall, for each session of the Congress, prepare a preliminary budget. Such budget shall include necessary amounts for staff personnel, travel, investigation, and other expenses of the Committee. After consultation with the minority members, the Chairman shall include an amount budgeted to minority members for staff under their direction and supervision. Thereafter, the Chairman shall combine such proposals into a consolidated Committee budget, and shall present the same to the Committee for its approval or other action. The Chairman shall take whatever action is necessary to have the budget as finally approved by the Committee duly authorized by the House. After said budget shall have been adopted, no substantial change shall be made in such budget unless approved by the Committee.

RULE 10. WITNESSES

In order to assure the most productive use of the limited amount of time available to question hearing witnesses, a witness who is scheduled to appear before the Committee shall file with the clerk of the Committee at least 24 hours in advance of his appearance a written statement of his proposed testimony. Failure to comply with this rule may result in the witness being denied the opportunity to testify in person. A witness shall limit his oral presentation to a summary of his position and shall provide sufficient copies of his written statement to the clerk for distribution to members, staff and news media.

RULE 11. QUESTIONING OF WITNESSES

Committee members may question witnesses only when recognized by the Chairman for that purpose. All members shall be limited to five minutes on the initial round of questioning. In questioning witnesses under the five-minute rule, the Chairman and the ranking minority member may be recognized first after which members may be recognized in the order of their arrival at the hearing. Among the members present at the time the hearing is called to order, seniority shall be recognized. In recognizing members to question witnesses, the Chairman may take into consideration the ratio of majority members to minority members and the number of majority and minority members present and shall apportion of recognition for questioning in such a manner as not to disadvantage the members of the majority.

RULE 12. PUBLICATION OF DECISIONS

A press release describing any tentative or final decision made by the Committee on legislation under consideration shall be made available to each member of the Committee as soon as possible, but no later than the next day. However, the legislative draft of any tentative or final decision of the Committee shall not be released until such draft is made available to each member of the Committee.

RULE 13. AMENDMENT TO PROVISION PREVIOUSLY READ

In the process of reading a bill for amendments, it shall be in order to return to a previously read portion of the bill for the purpose of considering and acting upon amendments thereto. However, if such previously read portion has been adopted by a record vote, it shall be in order for any member of the majority, on the same or the next day on which a quorum of the Committee is present, to move for the reconsideration thereof, and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions except the consideration of a motion to adjourn, and shall not be withdrawn without the consent of the Committee, and thereafter any member may call it up for consideration.

RULE 14. RECORD VOTES

A record vote on an issue shall be required on the request of a member which is supported by at least one-fifth of a quorum.

RULE 15. PREVIOUS QUESTION

The Chairman shall not recognize a member for the purpose of moving the previous question unless the member has first advised the Chair and those members present that this is the purpose for which recognition is being sought.

RULE 16. RECOMMENDATION FOR APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES

Whenever in the legislative process it becomes necessary to appoint conferees, the Chairman shall recommend to the Speaker as conferees the names of those members of the subcommittee (or subcommittees) which handled the substantive legislation in the order of their subcommittee seniority and such other Committee members as the Chaiman may designate. In making recommendations of minority members as conferees the Chairman shall consult with the ranking minority member of the Committee.

RULE 17. RECORDS OF HEARINGS

An accurate stenographic record shall be kept of all testimony taken at a public hearing. The staff shall transmit to a witness the transcript of this testimony for correction and immediate return to the Committee Office. Only changes in the interest of clarity, accuracy and corrections in transcribing errors will be permitted. Changes which substantially alter the actual testimony will not be permitted. Members shall correct their own testimony and return transcripts as soon as possible after receipt thereof. The Chairman may order the printing of the hearing without the corrections of a witness or member if he determines that a reasonable time has been afforded to make corrections and that further delay would impede the consideration of the legislative action which is the subject of the hearing. A witness appearing in a public hearing, or submitting a statement for the record of a public hearing, or submitting a written comment in response to a published request for comments by the Committee must provide the Committee with a list of any clients or persons, or any organization for whom the witness appears which shall be made available for public inspection unless otherwise directed by the Committee. Verbal testimony and statements for the record, or written comment in response to a request for comments by the Committee, will accept only from citizens of the United States or corporations or associations organized under the laws of one of the 50 States of the United States or the District of Columbia, unless otherwise directed by the Chairman of the Committee or subcommittee involved. Written statement from noncitizens may be considered for acceptance if transmitted to the Committee in writing by Members of Congress.

RULE 18. TRANSCRIPTS OF OTHER COMMITTEE MEETINGS

An accurate stenographic record shall also be kept of all markup and other meetings of the Committee, whether they be open or closed to the public. This record, marked as "uncorrected," shall be available for inspection by Members of the House, or members of the Committee together with their staffs at reasonable times and places. The record shall not be published or made public in any way except by a majority vote of the Committee. Before any public release of the uncorrected record, Members must be given a reasonable opportunity to correct their remarks. In instances in which a stenographic record is kept of a conference committee proceeding, all of the requirements of this rule will likewise be observed with respect to such record.

RULE 19. BROADCASTING OF COMMITTEE OR SUBCOMMITTEE

The provisions of clause 3(f) of Rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives are by reference specifically made a part of these rules. In addition, the Committee has adopted the following policy with respect to medical coverage of meetings:

An appropriate area of the Committee's hearing room is designated for members of the press and any equipment they use.

No interviews are allowed in the Committee room while the Committee is in session. Individual interviews must take place before the gavel falls for the convening of a meeting or after the gavel falls for adjournment.

Day-to-day notification of the next day's electronic coverage will be provided by the media to the Chairman through the chief counsel or some other person who might be designated in his absence.

Still photography will be permitted during a Committee meeting as long as it does not disrupt the proceedings or block the vision of Committee members or witnesses.

Klieg lights will be permitted to illuminate the hearing room only during the first fifteen minutes following the Chairman's initial calling of the Committee to order.

Further conditions may be specified by the Chairman.

RULE 20. PARTY RATIO

The ratio of Democrats to Republicans on any subcommittee of the Committee shall be consistent with the ratio of Democrats to Republicans on the Committee.

RULE 21. PROXY VOTING

Voting by proxy shall be permitted in accordance with the manner prescribed in clause 2(f) of Rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

RULE 22. TRAVEL OF MEMBERS AND STAFF

Consistent with the primary expense resolution and such additional expense resolution as may have been approved, the provisions of this rule shall govern travel of Committee members and Committee staff. Travel to be reimbursed from funds set aside for the full Committee for any member or any Committee staff member shall be paid only upon the prior authorization of the Chairman. Travel may be authorized by the Chairman for any member and any Committee staff member in connection with the attendance of formal or informal hearings conducted by the Committee, its subcommittees or any other committee or subcommittee of the Congress on matters relevant to the general jurisdiction of the Committee, and meetings, conferences and investigations which involve activities or subject matter relevant to the general jurisdiction of the Committee. Before such authorization is given there shall be submitted to the Chairman in writing the following:

(1) The purpose of the travel;

(2) The dates during which the travel is to be made and the date or dates of the event for which the travel is being made;

(3) The location of the event for which the travel is to be made;

(4) The names of members and Committee staff seeking authorization.

Where travel is in connection with the conduct by members of the Committee of an informal hearing, the prior approval not only of the Chairman but also of subcommittee chairmen shall be required where the hearing involves any matter within the jurisdiction of one or more of the subcommittees of the Committee.

In the case of travel of members and staff of a subcommittee to hearings, meetings, conferences, and investigations involving activities or subject matter under the legislative assignments of such subcommittee to be paid out of funds allocated to such subcommittee, prior authorization must be obtained from the subcommittee chairman and the Chairman. Such prior authorization shall be given by the Chairman only upon the representation by the applicable chairman of the subcommittee in writing setting forth those items enumerated above.

Within 60 days of the conclusion of any travel authorized under this rule, there shall be submitted to the Chairman a written report covering the information gained as a result of the study or investigation, or meeting, conference or hearing attended pursuant to such travel.●

SENATE—Tuesday, February 19, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, February 18, 1985)

The Senate met at 2 p.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Loving heavenly Father, we thank You for the safe return of Jeremy Levin. We pray for those who are still held captive, that they may soon be released. Bless every effort that is involved in achieving their freedom.

We pray, Lord God, for the members of the press and media, remembering that routine assignments often change suddenly into high risk situations. Thank You for the willingness of journalists to lay their lives on the line, however dangerous the circumstances.

We accept with reluctance, gracious God, that press and politics are often adversaries but we pray that they may never become enemies and that the relationship will not deteriorate into cynicism and despair. Bless those who devote their lives to keeping the people informed. Keep them in remembrance of the awesome power of words to motivate or discourage, to build up or to tear down, to enliven or to kill. In His name who is the Word of Life. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes of my time to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I thank my leader.

DEBATE OVER THE FISCAL YEAR 1986 DEFENSE BUDGET

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the debate over the fiscal year 1986 defense budget continues, both here in Congress and throughout the country. It is a very important debate not just because defense spending accounts for 29 percent of all Federal expenditures, but also because of what this budget is intended to accomplish. That is, to ensure the security of the United States and to protect our vital interests around the world. As the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, I intend to participate in this debate to ensure that when our final decisions on the budget are made, they will be based not on mere hunches or newspaper articles, but rather on a clear understanding of what is contained in the defense budget and the implications of major reductions to that budget.

This year, a series of witnesses appearing before the Armed Services Committee were each asked whether or not they thought the world was safer today than it was 20 years ago. In each case, the answer was the same; the world is indeed a more dangerous place today. We have little control over the conditions which create those dangers, yet they are the primary considerations which determine the size of our defense expenditures. It is worth noting that despite this increase in danger to our national interests, we actually spent more on defense in 1966—as a share of gross national product [GNP]—than we will in 1985: 7.6 percent in 1966, 6.4 percent in 1985.

There are some who have suggested that each year the Pentagon attempts to cram into the defense budget a series of new programs just for the sake of pursuing new technology, or expanding its budget, or promoting what some describe cynically as an incestuous relationship between the military and the defense industry. All of this makes for entertaining newspaper articles, but in truth, they are rather misinformed. In the 1986 defense budget, according to the Office of the Secretary of Defense, there is only one—let me repeat only one—new program start. The rest of the budget is devoted to programs begun in prior years which are essential to the modernization of our defense forces. In fact, the great majority of these programs—such as the M-1 tank, F/A-18 fighter, MX missile, Trident submarine, et cetera—were begun prior to the first Reagan administration. Most of these programs have reached or are approaching maturity and are being produced at efficient, economical levels.

Those who advocate major reductions in the defense budget, should be aware that reducing these production rates will only lead to inefficiencies and the loss of economies of scale. We have already had plenty of experience in stretching out programs during the late 1970's, and none of us can pretend not to know the consequences. When we stretch out programs the unit cost goes up, and in the end, we pay more to get less.

Those who advocate major defense reductions have a responsibility to understand the make-up of the defense budget. It is not enough to just say "cut this weapon system, or cut that one" in order to achieve major savings. It really is not that simple. In fact, looking at the outlay distribution for the 1986 defense budget one finds the following: 42.9 percent will be devoted to pay and related expenditures; 7 percent will go for operating expenses; 38.3 percent will be spent to fund prior year commitments; and only 11.9 percent will represent discretionary investment in 1986. This means that unless we are willing to sharply curtail operations, or significantly reduced pay, or cancel existing contracts, the brunt of any significant defense cut must be absorbed in the discretionary investment area. And that could be done—but it would mean virtually abolishing most of the major modernization programs for both our strategic and conventional forces. Given the current state of the world, I would consider that course ill-advised.

But fortunately, there is one indication that the state of world affairs may be headed for some improvement. I refer of course, to the fact that the Soviets have returned to the negotiationg table. Their efforts, alternately, to cajole, intimidate and fragment the West have failed. This is a triumph for the West that was achieved not by unilateral restraint or confused signals regarding our commitment to defense, but rather by 4 consecutive years of unwaivering determination to restore our defense posture. Now is therefore not the time to be considering major defense reductions or the wholesale cancellation of critical strategic programs.

Mr. President, I am grateful to my colleagues for this opportunity to help clarify some of the issues regarding the defense budget. I intend to make similar statements during the next several months which I hope will contribute to a better understanding of the defense debate. In the meantime, I will be pleased to consider any recommendation which my colleagues may wish to make to achieve worthwhile savings or greater efficiencies in this budget.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an outline of the fiscal year 1986 defense budget facts.

There being no objection, the outline was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FISCAL YEAR 1986 DEFENSE BUDGET FACTS

	Budget authority		Outlays
	Billion	Percent	Billion	Percent
Investment	$153	49	$33	12
Operations	37	12	19	7
Pay and related	124	37	119	43
Prior year commitments			106	38
Total	314		277

Procurement and R&D funding for new investment constitutes the "discretionary" portion of the budget. In other words, military personnel will have to be paid and current operations must be supported; cancelling prior year commitments would result in increased costs for termination penalties on signed contracts. The portion, then, of the budget where Congress can most easily make cuts is the investment area—only 12 percent of the outlay budget totaling only $33 billion.

Where Congress chooses to make cuts determines whether reduction targets can be met.

	Budget authority (billion)	Outlay (million)
Procurement	$1	$135
R&D	1	499
O&M	1	772
Military construction	1	143
Personnel	1	976

Historically, Congress has not made reductions in fast-spending accounts, such as personnel and operations and maintenance. Reductions are instead directed toward procurement and R&D programs, meaning that larger BA reductions must be made to accommodate the outlay reduction targets set as a deficit reduction goal.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. MCCONNELL]. The majority leader has the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is my understanding that, following the leaders' standing order of 10 minutes each, we have three special orders not to exceed 15 minutes each—the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER], the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], and the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN].

It is my hope that, at the hour of 3 o'clock, we might take up the Meese nomination. It is also my hope that we might have a vote on the Meese nomination sometime early tomorrow afternoon. We do have the joint session with the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Honorable Margaret Thatcher, at 11 o'clock. We had hoped to start reconsideration of the Meese nomination at about 1:30 tomorrow afternoon. We hope to reach a vote on that confirmation of Mr. Meese sometime early tomorrow afternoon.

It is also the hope of the leadership that if we dispose of the Meese nomination, we might then turn to Calendar No. 4, S. 391, the so-called highway bill. There is a bipartisan interest in completing action on this measure this week. Hopefully, we can conclude action on that measure on Thursday and, if not then, on Friday of this week. If we complete action on Thursday, it will not be the intention of the leadership to be in session on Friday.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Democratic leader is recognized.

ELIZABETH MOYNIHAN DIGS FOR LOST LOTUS GARDEN OF BABUR

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the study of archeology is one of those disciplines which puts the things of ordinary life into perspective. Like the contemplation of poetry, examining the ruins of civilizations and the artifacts of people long gone cultivates, one's ability to step back from the "everydayness" of our existence. It encourages viewing our own mores and societal peculiarities in a detached way. It is a wholly healthy and edifying preoccupation.

Recently while browsing through the Style Section of the Washington Post, I came across a thoroughly fascinating article about the wife of one of our esteemed colleagues who has made the study of archeology her avocation. Elizabeth Moynihan began a study of Mogul gardens 10 years ago when she was living in New Delhi as the wife of the American Ambassador. Her interest in a 1921 translation of the Journal of Babur—the emperor who founded the Mogul Dynasty in India—convinced her that the lotus garden described in such detail in the journal still existed.

Elizabeth followed the clues in the "Babur-Nama" and they led her to the discovery of the pleasure garden of Babur, built 450 years ago. Her find is considered a major archeological discovery. That discovery became part of a book authored by Elizabeth Moynihan entitled "Paradise as a Garden in Persia and Mogul, India." In addition, Elizabeth Moynihan has found time to serve as chairwoman of the Board of American Schools of Oriental Research.

"Liz Moynihan's Passage to India" appeared in the February 12 edition of the Washington Post. More than a story of an archeological find, it is the saga of a woman possessing tremendous intellectual curiousity and tenacious investigating skills. I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIZ MOYNIHAN'S PASSAGE TO INDIA—THE SENATOR'S WIFE AND HER DIG FOR THE LOST LOTUS GARDEN OF BABUR

(By Elisabeth Bumiller)

JHOR, INDIA.—The people in this small village of mud houses and lush fields aren't quite sure what to make of Elizabeth Moynihan, although they certainly find her interesting to watch. She spends her days on her hands and knees, digging up long-dried wells and prowling across the dirt floors of their living rooms with a trowel. A gang of 20 children follows every move she makes, giggling and eyes wide. "They think I'm crazy," she says. In the afternoons their parents offer her tea, which she takes alongside the water buffaloes and goats.

At the same time that her husband, Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.), was busy in Congress, his wife was literally on the other side of the world, unearthing an important archeological discovery here that she found herself. It is a pleasure garden built 450 years ago by Babur, the emperor who founded the Mogul Dynasty in India. "If you know what you're looking for here," she says, "you'll find it."

The Indians were stunned.

It began a decade ago when Elizabeth Moynihan was living in New Delhi as the American ambassador's wife. She was studying Mogul gardens in general and Babur in particular, poring over a 1921 translation of his journal, the "Babur-Nama." She became convinced that the lotus garden he described in such detail still existed, even though scholars thought it had long disappeared. Following his phrases like clues in a treasure hunt, she finally came upon the village of Jhor. She walked straight to a stone terrace the villagers used to dry cow dung patties, pushed aside some lentil branches and found, just as she had suspected, the remains of Babur's lotus pool.

"I was jumping up and down," she says. "It was terrific."

Babur was also her salvation from New Delhi embassy live, which can wrap visitors in a sterile gauze that carefully protects them from any real experience of living in India. Americans newly arrived to Delhi are inundated with information from fellow expatriates on where to get the best green olives, pastries and other reminders of home.

Entire conversations center on the number of times Americans have been sick from the water and dirt. Dinner parties can be as formal and stylized as those on the official circuit in Washington, with the exception of an occasional Indian face and the bearers, the phalanxes of servants who bring the food to the table. Some hostesses like to summon them with little silver bells.

"I was overwhelmed at everything," Moynihan says. "Pat's not a career diplomat, and I'm not attached to that whole world. I cried a lot, although I'm not sure what it was all about. But I feel I was lucky to be grabbed by something. If that happens, then the whole thing falls into place. People I know who didn't have that experience never got over the crying. Oh, the tears dried up, but the emotions were still there. I think it's worse in Delhi, where people have tried to re-create their own environment. It's not until you can shuck your own cultural baggage that you can perceive—and accept—the culture into which you've been thrust."

Moynihan now speaks of Babur as she would an old friend. "First of all, he's a genius," she says. "He was tactically very good at military exploits. He was a natural botanist. He spoke and wrote several languages. He was a poet. He was a musician."

It was at Babur's 500th birthday-anniversary party, celebrated two years ago with friends in India, that Pat Moynihan raised his glass and said proudly, "I'd like to make a toast to the other man in my wife's life."

AT THE ANCIENT GARDEN

To get to Jhor, you take the Taj Express, a three-hour train trip from New Delhi to Agra, the site of the Taj Mahal. On the train the attendant brings hot tea in an old china cup as fields of young green wheat and yellow mustard flowers flash by the window. Wild doves flutter through the cool, hazy sunshine. From Agra, it is a one-hour drive to Dholpur along a dusty road crowded with skeletal cows, camels pulling old wooden carts, holloweyed beggar children, noisy bazaars, vegetable stands and roastpeanut stalls. It smells smoky, spicy and musky, unlike anything in America.

At one bend in the road, a group of vultures is feasting on a dead dog.

In Dholpur, it is a five-minute drive down a dirt path to Jhor, where the car can go no farther. At the end of the road is Liz Moynihan, in Eddie Bauer jeans and a black sweater, 54 white-haired, opinionated and independent. She has an easy manner, the loose laugh of a salty politician's wife who has probably put up with a lot. She says she never gives interviews in the United States because she hates being asked questions like "What's it like being married to Pat?"

"The thing is," she says, "who'd put up with either one of us?"

She and her 27-year old daughter Maura are staying for the week at the nearby guest house—an enormous old bungalow built by the British on the scale of the Raj. There are peacocks and bougainvillea in the gardens, but the interior has seen considerable better days. The water comes from two little faucets in a dark, cavernous wash house: It has been a week since the Moynihans took a bath. The bedroom, which is the size of a small auditorium, has 50-foot ceilings, grimy walls and a lone-bed in the center. "It beats a tent," says Liz Moynihan.

The bill for the entire week comes to 49 rupees, or, at current exchange rates, $3.39.

Moynihan begins her tour of the garden, the usual gang of children at her heels. "Everybody thinks gardens are a very ladylike pursuit," she says, leading the way to Babur's bathhouse, still nearly intact and now used by a village family as a stable, "but nobody knows that you spend your life up to your ankles in you-know-what. Watch your step.

The village sits on top of most of the garden, which probably covered several acres. In its prime, it included a mosque, a pavilion, two pools and an aqueduct. Babur loved it and spent time recuperating there from his military exploits, using it not so much as a water garden as a country house away from the battles. Babur was the first of the Mogul invaders who came from the north—Moynihan calls them the world's most elegant nomads. His garden at Jhor is the only link between the water gardens of India and Persia.

He made regular entries in his journal, describing the garden in detail. On Jan. 13, 1529, he wrote: "A place was fixed in the S.E. of the garden for a hot bath, I ordered a plinth erected on the leveled ground, and a bath to be arranged, in one room of which was to be a reservoir 10 by 10."

Now Liz Moynihan points to an old pool. "We measured it this morning," she says, "and it turned out to be 10 by 10. Which is what he said. What do you know?"

She discovered the garden in 1978, returning to India after she had left three years before as the ambassador's wife. The country got under her skin in a deeper way than it did her husband's. "I had more fun," she says, "I seldom went anyplace with Pat because I was uncomfortable with the entourage. It's much better to take a train. I didn't go to the receptions, but he had to." Then, too, she says she was never sick in India, although her husband was sick all the time. "It got to be sort of a problem for us," she says, The senator maintains he was only sick once—it just lasted, he says, for 2½ years.

She didn't return to the garden again until 1983, when she showed it to Pat. Ever the politician, he held out sweets for the village children. Now she has returned a third time, this trip for a formal survey that she hopes will become a monograph, a record of use to architectural historians. The Indian government has declared it a protected site, and there is talk that the villagers will be relocated nearby and the garden made into a park.

"I haven't really thought about what I want done with it," Liz Moynihan says. "A foreigner can't come into a place and say, 'This is what should happen.' What I did say was, 'This is what did happen.' "

A commotion over by the lotus pool has started among the villagers. A pretty 16-year-old girl is sobbing on Maura Moynihan's shoulder, telling her in Hindi that she's unhappy because she is the only girl in the village not yet married. Maura, who is wearing a kurta and speaks fluent Hindi, listens as the girl tells her she is the youngest of six daughters and that her father has no more money for her dowry.

Maura decides to go to the village bazaar and buy her some things: a red sari, several silver bracelets and, for her kitchen, a brass urn and four stainless-steel platters. The bill isn't much more than $25, a fortune in this village. The girl is so grateful that she sobs and sobs, while her father, a painfully thin man with gray hair and deep lines in his face, shows the Americans a snapshot of the prospective groom. It is impossible to tell exactly what is going through his mind, but he appears both terribly embarrassed and terribly relieved.

He says the wedding will be in the summer. Maura Moynihan tells the girl that when she comes to the village again, she knows she'll see her with a new baby. The girl sobs some more, then brings a garland of marigolds that she puts over Maura's head.

"When I go into villages here," Liz Moynihan says a little later, "I really don't feel absolutely culturally different from these people. They offer you tea, they have manners. They want to carry your bag for you, they want to make you more comfortable. They love their children. It's not all that different. We all want the same thing."

She herself began work on a book about Mogul gardens soon after she left India. Babur's garden became an important part of that book, now called "Paradise as a Garden," but she gave herself exactly a two-sentence mention as the discoverer. There's no picture of her on the book flap, either, and no mention of who her husband happens to be.

"Pat says I was quite British about it all," she says.

THE PATH TO DIPLOMACY

Elizabeth Moynihan has always been a little different. In Washington she generally avoids the Senate wives, doing things like serving on a White House luncheon committee, then not turning up for the meal. She was born in Massachusetts, the daughter of a divorced Catholic woman who edited a local newspaper. She went to Boston University but never finished because she ran out of money and was terrible at math.

She met Pat Moynihan while both were working on Averell Harriman's campaign for governor of New York, but decided to leave Albany soon after the election. Then she broke her leg skiing and wound up staying and getting married. The courtship officially started when Pat came up to her in her wheelchair at a party and announced: "You're going to marry me." Liz Moynihan thought she'd heard him wrong and was embarrassed that this imaginary offer had leaped from her subconscious. But the next day he repeated it.

"So then we started going out," she says. "But if he bought dinner, I bought drinks. I was totally impossible. People didn't do that then."

She went with him to Washington when he joined the Labor Department during the Kennedy administration, then on with him to his professorship at Harvard. She came back to Washington when he served on Richard Nixon's White House staff ("We had a big fight about that," she says), then left with him for India in 1973. They had their three children with them—Maura, John and Tim.

"I had terrible culture shock," she says. "I had never been to India before."

The American ambassador's residence didn't help. "You've seen the Kennedy Center, so you've seen the embassy," she says. "You open the front door and it's like the hall of flags. The first thing I did was put up a badminton net and a Ping-Pong table and let John's friends play there." The architect of the building had in fact designed the Kennedy Center—Edward Durrell Stone, whom some critics call the master of mediocrity.

The house also came with the usual barrage of servants, common to the homes of foreigners in India. "I hated it," she says. How many were there? "Let's see," she says. "One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight in the house, then the watchman, the malis [gardeners], oh, God, there were about six of them. And the electrician. That huge space had to be air-conditioned. He was there all the time."

She describes life among the diplomatic corps as "incestuous." "They entertain each other. For the most part they were senior career people, they'd met all the people they'd wanted to meet, and what they really cared about was their retirement home, had they bought all the things for it, and had they shipped them yet."

So Liz Moynihan avoided the parties and began studying her gardens, traveling all over the subcontinent. Diplomatic eyebrows were raised. "We'd been there almost a year," she says, "when Mrs. Gandhi had a reception, a garden party. It was for ambassadors' wives and their children. It was very pleasant, and she had a little gift for each child. And she said something very odd to me. She said, "You're doing the right thing not going to those parties—don't you worry about their complaints.' Well, that was the first I'd heard of those complaints. She knew all the gossip."

The final straw of diplomatic Life came after Liz Moynihan was well into the 100 calls on ambassadors wives that she was expected to make. "I made 60," she says. "You don't know what I've done for my country." One day she paid a visit to the wife of a South American country's ambassador, who proudly brought out her collection of wigs that she kept on fake heads. At one point, she plopped one of the heads right in Liz Moynihan's lap.

"That was the last call," she says.

SUNSET

Now it's evening, and Liz Moynihan, never one to miss a moment of drama, decides that at the end of her last day in the garden she will read aloud from the Babur-Nama at sunset. She walks up to a ridge that overlooks the garden, opens the well-worn book and begins. The sun is a deep orange on the horizon, and the air is silent and cool.

A village man, barefoot and wrapped in a plaid blanket, sidles up to her, sits down, then looks at her with a mixture of puzzlement and intensity, as if trying to understand a difficult lecture. He understands Hindi, not English, but he listens to every word.

At the end, she's sad. "Well, that's it," she says, sighing as she closes Babur's journal. "Hell of a guy."

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to my distinguished friend [Mr. CRANSTON].

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank my friend.

SENATE EXPRESSES SERIOUS RESERVATIONS ABOUT ANY NEW ARMS SALES TO SAUDI ARABIA

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, recently, a strong majority of my Senate colleagues joined me in an effort to convey our deep concern about proposals to send Saudi Arabia a new package of sophisticated weaponry. Indeed, within a matter of hours, I was able to enlist the bipartisan support of a total of 63 Senators on a letter to President Reagan making clear our serious reservations against any such sale.

Subsequently, the administration deferred consideration of Saudi Arabias request, and no arms sale offer was made to King Fahd during his recent visit to Washington.

But I remain concerned that the administration may once again move toward granting the Saudi request, which is reported to include another 40 F-15 aircraft—in addition to the 62 F-15's they already have—3,000 Sidewinder AIM 9-L and AIM 9-P air-to-air missiles, Maverick antitank missiles, multiple ejection bomb racks, range-extending fuel tanks, and perhaps even more AWACS aircraft. Such a package would equal in magnitude the 1982 AWACS package, the largest single U.S. arms transfer in history.

In 1982, President Reagan assured Congress that future arms deliveries to Saudi Arabia would take place only if "initiatives toward the peaceful resolution of disputes in the region have either been successfully completed or that significant progress toward that goal has been accomplished with the substantial assistance of Saudi Arabia." Clearly, neither of these conditions has been met. And clearly, Saudi Arabia is continuing to play a role in thwarting American peace efforts, through its ongoing bankrolling of the PLO and Syria, through its continued refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist, through its continued efforts to punish Egypt for signing the Camp David treaties, and through its continued efforts to strangle Israel economically through the Arab boycott.

Furthermore, there are serious questions regarding the Saudis need for such a new arms package, given the diminishing threat facing the Saudis from Irans crippled forces—which the Saudis already have the ability to overwhelm.

Such a sale would be certain to initiate a new cycle of costly and destabilizing arms purchases throughout the volatile Middle East, fueling a regional arms race which further erodes the technological edge and both the economic and military security of Israel.

It is for these reasons and more than a strong majority of the Senate has gone on record with serious reservations against such a sale. I trust that the Reagan administration will take these serious reservations into account in any subsequent conversations they may have with Saudi leaders about arms sales. We need much more constructive action from Saudi Arabia to support American peace efforts and to end the Saudis state of war with Israel before Congress will look favorably upon new Saudi requests.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the letter to the President on this issue, signed by 63 Senators, appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, January 29, 1985.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We are writing to express our deep concern about reports of an imminent Administration decision to sell Saudi Arabia significant additional military weaponry.

We have serious reservations about the wisdom of such a sale at this time.

Therefore, we respectfully request that prior to making any decision or commitment on such a sale, you undertake thorough consultations with the leadership and appropriate committees of the Congress.

Sincerely,

Senators Cranston, Andrews, Baucus, Bentsen, Biden, Bingaman, Boren, Boschwitz, Bradley, Bumpers, Burdick, Chiles, Cohen, DeConcini, Dodd, Hawkins, Packwood, Durenberger, Exon, Ford, Gore, Gorton, Grassley, Harkin, Hart, Hatch, Hecht, Heinz, Hollings, Inouye, Johnston, Dixon, Kasten, Kennedy, Kerry, Lautenberg, Leahy, Levin, Long, Matsunaga, McConnell, Melcher, Metzenbaum, Mitchell, Moynihan, Murkowski, D'Amato, Pell, Pressler, Proxmire, Pryor, Quayle, Rockefeller, Riegle, Sarbanes, Sasser, Simon, Specter, Trible, Weicker, Wilson, Danforth, and Symms.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time to Mr. BOREN for his control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

THE FARM CRISIS

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague and Democratic leader for yielding to me his time.

I heard the expressions on the schedule offered earlier by the distinguished majority leader. I say I hope also that we shall be able to proceed with business as planned this week; but I think, in all conscience, whether or not we are able to proceed as planned with business as usual will depend upon whether or not we are able to reach an agreement to schedule for speedy action on the Senate floor an effective farm crisis package that will avert the disaster that is looming across the heartland of America, in agricultural communities across this country.

Just during this recess, I held five regional hearings in my home State of Oklahoma to discuss the present crisis in agriculture. At the hearing which I conducted in Oklahoma City, which was an official Senate agriculture hearing, representatives from the Oklahoma Bankers' Association and the Community Bankers' Association testified. They estimated that 13 to 15 percent of Oklahoma's farmers and ranchers would be forced out of business this year unless the existing debt could somehow be restructured.

Mr. President, these figures are not representative only of Oklahoma; they are representative of the entire heartland of America. If we should allow that many farm units to collapse in 1 year, it could well have a domino effect not just on the agricultural sector of this country but on the financial institutions and the small businesses from coast to coast. It is an effect that will be felt in our Nation's largest cities before it ceases to reverberate, and its impact is far from certain, but it is undoubtedly of very serious magnitude.

So, Mr. President, I only say that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON] and I have previously notified the majority leader that we hope to be able to have assurance from him that action on an effective agricultural credit package will be scheduled very soon. We simply cannot wait. We do not have 6 months, we do not have even 3 months. We need action, in my opinion, in the next few days by the entire Congress to avert disaster. Therefore, we are prepared to use those parliamentary tools available to us to focus the attention of our colleagues on the disaster that is looming in the agricultural sector of our economy.

I hope that negotiations will be successful with the majority leader and others that will allow us to proceed in a timely fashion. If such an agreement can be reached, it is not our intention to delay action on other matters, but we cannot, in conscience, allow other matters to go forward until we know that action has been scheduled very soon on an emergency package for agriculture.

Mr. President, at this time, I yield as much time as he needs to my distinguished colleague from Nebraska [Mr. EXON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I thank my friend and colleague from Oklahoma. I endorse everything he has just said. There is a strong feeling on both sides of the aisle today that we have a dual crisis in agriculture. The first is the short line or the short track. The next 45 days is especially critical. Unless we can do more here in Congress in cooperation—and I emphasize the word "cooperation"—with the administration, then somewhere between 5 and 20 percent, at least, of our farmers are not going to get a crop in the ground in 1985.

This is not a Democratic problem, it is not a Republican problem, it is a national one and will require the dedication of all of us to do something about it. The other, longer, track on this dual track is the longer term problem in agriculture that we shall also be addressing this year in the 1985 farm bill. But first things first. It is the short track that is of critical importance to the soundness of our food-producing plants in America.

Mr. President, we shall be hearing a lot about this in the next few hours and in the next few days. If nothing else takes place in the U.S. Senate, I think it is fundamental that we come to an agreement, a bipartisan agreement, if you will, to do something about this problem rather than just laying it aside.

There are those of us on this side of the aisle—and there are a number on that side of the aisle—who are going to insist that we have some kind of an arrangement to fast track this short line approach to get something done and get it done fast. For the most part, the laws are presently on the books for the administration to do 90 percent of what we think it should do. Therefore, some of the legislation we will be introducing will be in a form to draw attention in the Senate and the House of Representatives to what can be done that without additional legislation.

What we are doing then is seeking some bargaining chips, with which we are going to seek cooperation and understanding so that the Senate might move ahead to do its work on a measure that we would all like.

Failing that, I must emphasize once again that we are not about to take a backseat to any item that might be brought forth on the floor of the Senate.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time allowed the Democratic leader has expired.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time I and others need be charged to the 15 minutes that has been allotted previously to the Senator from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. EXON. I yield to Senator BOREN, who has control of the time.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BOREN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry. Are we now on the 15 minutes of my special order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BOREN. Can we proceed at this point in time? Is that in order?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, in what order are the special orders?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The original order was for the Senator from Pennsylvania to be next but by unanimous consent that was changed.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? It is my understanding that the Senator from Pennsylvania was first, the Senator from Wisconsin was second, and the Senator from Oklahoma was third. Now we have it reversed.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I understand there was unanimous consent just agreed to that would allow us to proceed with the 15 minutes at this time so that it would flow uninterrupted with the leadership time; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. CRANSTON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 13 minutes.

Mr. BOREN. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from California.

THE FARM CRISIS

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Nebraska for the leadership they are providing the troubled farmers of America. I associate myself with their effort.

Mr. President, it is generally felt that the farm problem is mainly one in the heartland of the country. However, that is not the case. There are many farmers in California who are in desperate straits. Basically, these farmers are not in trouble because of their failings or faults but because of Government policies that have put them into a desperate situation.

I am eager to work with other Senators to find a solution to the problem to the best of our abilities. I believe we can and must give great focus to this problem at this time because the situation is desperate.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR].

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Oklahoma for yielding. I would like to make a point or two about the agricultural situation.

Mr. President, last week Newsweek magazine had a cover picture of an American farmer, and the caption under that picture, Mr. President, was "The Angry Farmer." Over the last week, I visited with some 3,000 to 4,000 farmers in the State of Arkansas.

I must say that I did not find angry farmers, Mr. President. I found bewildered farmers; I found frustrated farmers, farmers who recognize that they have today become an economic prisoner of an agricultural policy—a national policy—that has given them a death row sentence. And, they are sitting on death row, Mr. President, just as certainly as we are standing in this Senate this afternoon. The agricultural credit crisis must be solved. It must be given top priority in the business of this Senate or we are going to see the very foundation, the very social and economic fabric of this country, come unglued. It will have a ripple effect throughout our entire economic structure that could be devastating to our great country. We simply must act on the farm crisis now, not at some point in the future.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER].

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Oklahoma. I applaud his action and that of the Senator from Nebraska in bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate today. I am delighted to see my junior colleague on the floor. I suspect that he will bear out my observations.

I have talked to a great many farmers in my State during the past few months. My visits with them indicate that they are facing the worst economic crisis since the dark days of the depression in the early 1930's.

Make no mistake about it, Mr. President, there is a short-term credit crisis down on the farm, and unless we act and act quickly, in conjunction with this administration, we are going to lose 20 to 30 percent of the farmers in my State because they do not have the funds to put their crops in the ground this spring.

I say to you, Mr. President, it is not the fault of these farmers. It is not bad mangement on their part. It is the result of overwhelming Federal deficits that have skyrocketed the value of the American dollar in the international currency market. American farm products today cannot compete abroad. Land prices are declining as much as 40 percent in some Midwestern States—as much as 20 percent in 1 year.

I submit, Mr. President, that unless we deal very shortly—I am talking about in a matter of days and certainly weeks—with this short-term farm credit crisis, we are going to give a death blow to literally thousands of family farmers across this country.

For that reason, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER].

Mr. MELCHER. I thank my friend for yielding on this very important subject.

Mr. President, in refusing to grant the necessary farm credit to abate the agricultural emergency credit crunch that we are in right now, President Reagan is dead wrong.

After getting an overwhelming percentage of the votes from agriculture and agribusiness and from their bankers last fall, President Reagan now has a strategy that advocates a "market-oriented policy" and an "orderly transition."

In effect, what this means is that commodity prices for farmers should be even lower than they are now and there should be an "orderly transition" of farmers going broke and out of business.

What I advocate is akin to what the Independent Bankers Association have endorsed, and that is to use their existing lending process for their borrowers and provide emergency credit by reducing the interest rates and longer terms for the loans. Agricultural loans would become federally guaranteed loans. They are not necessarily very costly to the Federal Government. A virtually small amount results in losses—a very small amount compared to other Government expenditures.

What we are attempting to do is to save these farmers and ranchers from going broke and to save agribusiness and their lenders from disaster.

The program we advocate would also apply to Production Credit Association borrowers whose loans are in distress.

The guaranteed loans at reduced interest rates over a longer period of time for repayment will provide a chance to save agricultural producers. To implement this program I and others are joining Senator ZORINSKY in a bill he is introducing today.

The cost to the Government can be met without exceeding in outlays the Department of Agriculture average outlays for the past 2 years. It is not a budget busting proposal.

It is absolutely vital.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Senator from Montana.

Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Nebraska for the leadership they are providing on this issue.

Let me make a prediction. They will receive a great deal of support from Senators in the so-called industrial States because we have a large number of farm families. Indeed, in my State there are more farm families than in the State of Nebraska, South Dakota, and Oklahoma. They will receive support from us because we represent consumers who will end up paying much more for food if we lose 5 percent to 30 percent of our farms.

I hope that the majority leader, who I know has been listening to this discussion this afternoon, is going to agree to a schedule, as the Senator from Oklahoma asks, for some legislation addressing the crisis in America.

David Stockman may say that if you lose 5 percent to 30 percent of the farms, this is a dynamic economy at work. I say it is a sick agricultural economy at work if that happens. We cannot allow it to happen. We have to pierce the protective armor that has surrounded this President on this matter. He has to hear the story as I heard it last week in Michigan, South Dakota, and Nebraska, where I spent a week listening to this plight.

I am convinced that the Senate must and will act promptly on this crisis.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. President, I think it is clear from the voices we have heard—and if there were time, we could hear from twice as many—that there is determination on this floor that, if necessary, we will bring other business to a halt until we focus on the dire situation we are now confronting in agriculture.

I yield 1 minute to the junior Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Nebraska for their leadership in this effort. I want them to know that I join them.

During the past 10 days, I have had some 25 to 30 town hall meetings in Tennessee; and, like my senior colleague from Tennessee, who spoke a moment ago, I find signs of a real disaster for the farm economy in Tennessee. It has been building for quite some time, of course, but the time for us to respond is now.

The President's spokesman on budget and economic policy, Mr. Stockman, was quoted as saying last week something to the effect that saving small farmers is not worth the effort. Mr. President, the farmers in Tennessee and elsewhere in this country did not ask for deficits in the $200 billion range which are pushing the dollar's value all out of proportion to its worth and are making their products difficult to sell overseas.

The nomination of Mr. Meese may take an extremely long time if we do not get some response to the great needs of the farmers in this country.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON].

Mr. SIMON. I thank my colleague from Oklahoma, and I applaud his leadership and that of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON] in this matter.

It is grim out there for the farmers. I see my friends from Iowa, Kansas, and other States. It is grim everywhere.

Some people say to me, "What is the difference? We let the local hardware store go down. Why do we help the farmers?"

The difference is between the small bank and Continental, between the hardware store and Chrysler. We could not let Chrysler go down because of its national implications. We could not let Continental go down because of its national implications. We cannot let one-fifth or one-sixth of the farmers of this country go down the drain without having massive economic dislocation.

So we have to move on this matter, and I hope we will do so in this session and move quickly.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Senator for his thoughtful remarks.

Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BUMPERS].

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, in my State alone there are thousands of Farmers Home Administration applications pending. They could not begin to process all the applications until long past planting time.

I cannot believe that the President of the United States really believes or endorses what either David Stockman or John Block have said. I further believe that if we can pass a bill in the next 2 or 3 days and send it to the President, he will be more than happy to sign it.

Since I have been in the Senate, we have bailed out Continental Illinois and Chrysler Motors. We have appropriated money to the International Monetary Fund because they owed $600 billion to American banks which they could not pay.

The cost of what we want to do here now is minimal compared to any of those. I voted to bail out New York City, and I can tell you that in the State of Arkansas that was not the most popular vote I ever cast, but I thought it was important.

Mr. President, I will not belabor the matter. I echo what has already been said. I commend my colleagues.

Condemning David Stockman or John Block or the President of the United States is not our purpose. Our purpose is to try to save the 7 percent to 13 percent of farmers who will not be able to stay in farming this year unless we do something fast.

I promise you one thing: If we let the farmers go down the tube, whatever the budget savings are this year, the losses down the pike will be a hundred times that much.

I thank Senator BOREN and Senator EXON for their efforts and for yielding to me.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

I thank the distinguished minority leader for yielding time to me.

Mr. President, this is a concern that is felt not only on this side of the aisle. I have talked with my colleagues on the other side of the aisle as well, and I know that many of them share that concern. Many are from farm States and have agricultural communities, and we will be discussing this matter again this afternoon. We look forward to meeting with the distinguished majority leader very shortly.

We have no choice. It is not a matter of delaying action. I have already made clear that my position in the parliamentary situation is not based upon my own personal view of the nomination that will be pending shortly. I am not bringing up this matter in opposition to that nominee or any other piece of legislation. I simply feel that it is imperative that we act before it is too late.

We realized that there was a crisis when we had the Continental Bank matter. We were dealing with $5 billion or $6 billion. We have talked about the catastrophe that would occur if there were default on five or six key Latin American loans.

Those loans total about $50 billion to $60 billion.

We are dealing here with $220 billion worth of credit that cannot at this time be financed in the agricultural sector of this country.

Mr. President, I only conclude by asking if when 1.5 percent of our farm units were forced on the market last year it caused a 10-percent decline in the market value of land, what will happen in this country if 13 to 15 percent of the farm units of this country are forced onto the market within a period of time perhaps as short as the next 6 months? What impact will it have on the rest of this economy?

There was a saying in the 1930's that the depression of that time was farm led and farm fed, that it began with the collapse of land unit of value, of land unit of value not only to agriculture but to the rest of the economy.

Mr. President, no matter what I or anyone else might wish, we simply cannot afford to wait, and that is the message that we have tried to deliver on the floor of the Senate today. We cannot wait. In conscience we cannot be a party to waiting to take action on this serious matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oklahoma has expired.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the morning business time today be extended to 3:30 p.m. under the same terms and conditions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I have been asked by the distinguished minority leader to have 2 minutes of my time, which I hereby yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

AMERICAN FARMER CREDIT CRISIS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I wish to express my concern over the credit crisis facing American farmers. It is a crisis that affects not only farmers and their families, but also the banks that have loaned money to those farmers and the economic future of thousands of farm communities across the Nation.

We should not turn our backs on the crisis situation that now prevails. I hope that the administration will respond and support the efforts of those Senators here who are speaking out today, who are attempting to deal with this problem and to resolve it quickly before it ends in disaster for so many farm families across this country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time I consumed not be charged against my friend's time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Pennsylvania.

S. 464—RELATING TO THE SALE OF CONRAIL

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am today introducing two bills dealing with the sale of Conrail, and I do so at the first available moment on the Senate floor after the proposal by the Secretary of Transportation, Elizabeth Dole, to sell Conrail to Norfolk Southern.

Mr. President, I have been concerned about the sale of Conrail since last June when proposals were made by three private bidders. My first concern arose in connecting with potential harmful consequences to my own State, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. During the course of my studies, and further review, I have became very much concerned about the proposed sale of Conrail in terms of the very serious, if not disastrous, consequences which will result for the entire Nation.

It is for that reason that I am today introducing these two bills. The first bill blocks the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. The second bill proposes that in the event that a sale of Conrail is deemed advisable, it proceed by public stock offering, and not by private sale.

Mr. President, I come to the views which I hold as a result of extensive consultation with labor and business, both within Pennsylvania and outside of my State, and after consultation with the Secretary of Transportation, Elizabeth Dole.

In addition to those meetings, I have studied voluminous documents, and I have participated in six hearings. Three hearings were held in Pennsylvania late last year—October in Harrisburg, in December in Philadelphia, and in January in Pittsburgh. Then, along with Senator Dixon of Illinois, my cochair on the Northeast-Midwest Senate Coalition, hearings were held in Washington this year in January and February. I held the sixth hearing yesterday, and again in Pittsburgh. As a result of those hearings, I am convinced that it would be strongly contrary to the national interest to proceed with the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern.

The best starting point on this issue is to deal with an article published by the distinguished Secretary of Transportation, Elizabeth Dole, in the New York Times the day before yesterday, Sunday, February 17.

I applaud Secretary Dole on her sincerity. But I must disagree with her both on her analysis of the facts, and on her conclusions as to what is best for the United States.

In the New York Times article Secretary Dole refers to a review of the Norfolk Southern by the Department of Justice, and she concludes that there will be preservation of competition in the region now served by Conrail.

My analysis of the facts convinces me that exactly the contrary is the case.

Today these two carriers, Conrail and Norfolk Southern, compete and have over 1,200 miles of parallel trackage throughout their systems.

The proposed sale would combine the current 18,000 miles of Norfolk Southern with 15,000 miles of Conrail and would have a very serious anticompetitive impact on the entire Nation.

The magnitude of the threat to competition is apparent when one considers that the combined rail system would have approximately 60 percent of the rail market in Michigan, 95 percent of the market in northeast Indiana, 70 percent of the southern Michigan steel traffic, 85 percent of the Cleveland grain traffic, and 94 percent of the eastbound New England-New York-Texas corridor rail traffic.

In fact, the Department of Justice itself in its January 29 report noted that the merger of Norfolk Southern and Conrail will have a "very serious anticompetitive effect."

It is apparent on the face of the Justice Department letter that Justice was straining to find some way to approve what the Secretary of Transportation wanted to accomplish. The final arbiter on the use of compliance with the antitrust laws, however, is obviously not the Department of Justice, but the courts. I submit that lawsuits which have already been promised by the Chessie Railroad at hearings held by the Northeast-Midwest coalition, will result in a round of litigation that will last a decade. The eventual conclusion will be to ban this proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern on the ground that it would violate the antitrust laws.

The Department of Justice further outlined the fact that there would be anticompetitive effects in 100 markets, and in 21 States. The Justice considerations ignored the impact on the area east of Buffalo, Harrisburg, and Philadelphia, and further ignored the antitrust problem which would be magnified by the consequences of abandonment of lines by the CSX Corp. On the basis of the existing facts, there is, therefore, no question about a violation of the antitrust laws.

The second point that Secretary Dole makes is one relating, as she points out in this New York Times article, to the best way to preserve service to Conrail shippers.

The conclusive evidence presented at the hearings which I have referred to discloses that there would be an adverse impact on shippers throughout the area served by Conrail within the Northeast-Midwest region.

Testimony, for example, by John Westhouse, the director of traffic for National Steel, disclosed that in 12 markets in which National Steel now ships where competition presently exists between Conrail and Norfolk Southern, such competition would be obliterated, thus raising prices for National Steel.

Similar testimony was given by Robert Corcoran, director of traffic for the United States Steel Corp.

I suggest, Mr. President, that it would be very harmful to add to the substantial costs which the American steel industry has already sustained in its battle to compete with foreign imports.

Testimony by many other shippers, including PPG, Fort Pitt Consolidators, and Consolidation Coal, disclosed that they now benefit from the competition of Conrail and Norfolk Southern, and that such petition would be eliminated by the proposed merger.

Throughout the corridor presently served by Conrail, such disastrous effects upon shippers, especially small shippers, would result, thereby adding to the cost of goods sold, impacting upon consumers, and causing a very severe inflationary impact.

The next issue involves the assertion by Secretary Dole that the "public should gain the best possible return on its investment" by a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern.

Mr. President, a return to the taxpayers of $1.2 billion for 85 percent of the stock of Conrail is a very small price considering the following facts. First, the taxpayers have expended $7 billion on Conrail. Second, the book value of Conrail is in excess of $4 billion at the present time. We have yet not had an itemization of the assets of Conrail, notwithstanding my request to Secretary Dole which has been pending since August of 1984. At the present time, Conrail has $1.050 billion in cash—some $850 million in a cash reserve, and $200 million in excess funding for the pension plan which is really cash available to Conrail.

On the basis of these undisputed facts, Mr. President, I suggest that $1.2 billion for 85 percent of the stock is a grossly low price to be received by the taxpayers of the United States and the U.S. Government and that, in any event, such a low price should preclude any sale at this time. The bidding may be reopened and bids at a later date should not be hard to obtain, considering the fact that Conrail is currently earning profits of $500 million a year. Even without the tax breaks which Conrail presently receives as a governmental entity it would earn in the range of $230 million a year.

Secretary Dole further asserts in her New York Times article that the Conrail employees deserve to know what they futures hold. This assertion suggests that Conrail employees would be protected by the proposed sale to Norfolk Southern. The contrary is the fact. Norfolk Southern, in a press conference held last week, conceded that at least 2,500 employees would lose their jobs, and the estimates are that many times that number would in fact lose their employment.

The Secretary of Transportation further asserts that Conrail's Philadelphia offices would be maintained. Such an assertion seems fine, but there is no specification of the time period, and it is obviously inevitable that Norfolk Southern headquartered in Norfolk, VA, would abandon the Philadelphia, PA, offices.

One factor not considered by the Secretary of Transportation is of enormous importance to this Nation, and that is the competition offered by the port of Philadelphia to the port of Norfolk. If Norfolk Southern acquires Conrail, it will be only a short time before rail traffic will be diverted from the port of Philadelphia—notwithstanding the enormous investments made in that port to handle coal, and notwithstanding the absence of competitive benefits which run to the shippers now able to choose between ports through which to send their coal and their other products.

I do agree with one assertion in Secretary Dole's article, and that is the statement that an acquisition by Norfolk Southern would provide long-term stability for the Conrail system. Mr. President, I submit that the best way to provide maximum stability for the rail system in this country is to have one rail owner. But that is hardly the preferable course for this country, which thrives on competition. Further, it is too high a price to pay for stability to eliminate the competition which now benefits so many shippers throughout the areas now served by Conrail.

Mr. President, as to the issue of price, persuasive testimony has been adduced by investment bankers at Morgan Stanley that a public sale would yield $300 to $400 million more than the $1.2 billion offered by Norfolk Southern. On the basis of this record, it is my conclusion that the national interest would be best served by not selling Conrail at all at this time.

I do agree as a matter of philosophy that it is desirable ultimately to return

Conrail to the private sector because, over the long term, a Government-held railroad should not exist and compete with private railroads. But on its face, given the sale price of $1.2 billion—which is totally inadequate according to the facts at hand—no sale would be the best alternative at the present time. If that fails, Mr. President, then I urge that the best alternative, considering the necessity for a sale, would be a public offering which would return the stock of Conrail to the American people and would, according to a very reliable estimate, yield $300 to $400 million more than the price is being offered by Norfolk Southern.

Mr. President, I make this statement today at some length because I think it is vitally necessary that the Senate of the United States focus on this issue at this time. Some suggestion has been made about folding the Conrail sale into the budget resolution, which I strongly oppose. But this matter will soon be before this body on one day or another. These facts are matters of great importance which far transcend the cataclysmic consequences to the State of Pennsylvania in terms of the loss of corporate headquarters, the loss of the repair yards in Hollidaysburg near Altoona and the impact on some 15,000 employees and 2,300 shippers. It is not in the national interest to sell Conrail to Norfolk Southern.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the two bills that I am introducing today be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 464

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress finds that—

(1) the United States has invested more than $7,000,000,000 in the Consolidated Rail Corporation since April 1, 1976;

SEC. 2. (a) Notwithstanding any provision of law, any disposition of the government's interest in the Consolidated Rail Corporation shall proceed by public stock offering, and not by private sale.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

HOW TO CUT THE DEFICIT BY $75 BILLION IN 1986

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in the past few weeks there has been an increasing sentiment in the country and in the Congress to take some of the hard, tough steps necessary to begin to reduce the immense Federal deficit. Republican Senators, lead by Majority Leader ROBERT DOLE, Budget Chairman PETE DOMENICI and others have begun to put together a combination of spending restrictions that obviously take political courage to propose and I think they have great merit. Their general idea is that if we can hold spending in 1986 at the same level as it will be in 1985, the growth of the economy, which is estimated to raise about $55 billion in additional revenue in 1986 compared to 1985, will sharply cut the deficit. So the roughly $220 billion estimated deficit of 1985 would decline. But by how much? It would not decline by $55 billion. Why not? Because at least one major expenditure cannot be reduced by congressional fiat—that is the increase of about $12 billion in interest on the national debt now estimated for 1986.

There is one other major expenditure that will surely rise in 1986—defense outlays. This splits the White House from the Congress. At best the Congress can expect to hold the increase in military spending down to a "real"—that is after inflation—level of 3 percent. That would mean an increase in actual dollars of 7.2 percent or about $18 billion.

All this would mean that if the Republican Senators should succeed in freezing all other expenditures in 1986, including politically explosive Social Security benefits, the spending in 1986 would rise by $30 billion. If revenues were to rise by $55 billion, the deficit would fall by $25 billion. That would bring the 1986 deficit down from about $220 billion to $195 billion. What is wrong with that? Plenty. The 1986 deficit would be distinctly worse than the 1984 deficit of $175 billion. Such a reduction in the deficit is far too little. It's specially too little for another reason. The denial of a cost-of-living increase to Social Security recipients would come at a time when the Social Security trust fund will be showing a sharply growing surplus and the military will be enjoying an $18 billion increase. Many of the retired elderly would protest and with reason.

The Republican majority in the Senate can and will do better than this. They have not disclosed the details. But they will not simply propose a freeze in nonmilitary programs. They will propose to cut some agencies' budgets sharply. They would eliminate others entirely. The administration has set the pace with a long list of Federal Government functions they would terminate at the end of the current fiscal year. The administration would abolish the Small Business Administration, the Job Corps, revenue sharing, the Work Incentive Program, urban development ACTION grants, operating subsidies for public transportation, legal services, virtually all publicly assisted housing programs, the Community Action Agency, and others. In addition the administration would not simply freeze other programs at the 1985 level. It would reduce the level of spending in these agencies in some cases to a sharply lower level. Farm price supports, foreign aid, educational assistance and many others would suffer actual reductions in funding. Republican Senators would not go as far in this respect as the President. Almost no one would give the President much of a chance of getting these reductions. They may be wrong. Here is why: The President can get virtually all of these reductions if he is willing to use his veto early and often, and go the country to appeal for support for his crusade to hold down spending. All he needs to hold down spending anywhere is his veto and one-third plus one of the House or the Senate. If he goes for it, he will get it.

Is it possible the President could achieve his aim of actually cutting the deficit by $44 billion and get the deficit level down to $180 billion in 1986? Yes, and then some. That is not only possible. The President can do better than this. How? Listen: the Congress can cut the President's military program by at least $18 billion below what he has requested by holding the increase to 3 percent in real terms—7.2 percent in nominal terms. It can cut his foreign aid program by $2 or $3 billion and his requests for NASA—that is, for the Space Program—by $1 billion or so. If the President wields his veto vigorously, and the Congress gives the President less than he asks in military spending, space and foreign aid requests, and if the Congress resists all supplementals, the deficit reduction could go to $60 billion and the level of spending overall for the Federal Government, including both military spending and interest on the national debt in 1986, could actually fall below the spending level in 1985. It could do so without any cuts in Social Security cost-of-living adjustments.

And that is not all. If the President stood by his guns on "no tax increase," he could still raise revenues by at least $15 billion by calling for a minimum tax of 15 percent or so on the net income of corporations and individuals with very substantial net incomes—say $100,000 in the case of individuals and $1,000,000 in the case of corporations which pay little or no income taxes. We know. I document it again and again; that is, the fact some of the leading corporations in this country make billions of dollars in net income a year and pay nothing in income taxes. General Dynamics, for instance, has paid no income taxes since 1972, our No. 1 defense contractor.

The minimum tax would have to be absolutely without exception or exemption. Present minimum taxes are a joke. This proposal would not touch the taxes paid by 99 percent-plus of the people in this country. It would simply require that high income individuals and corporations pay a minimum, a small part of their net income. In the case of individuals, it would be less than a third of what the top tax bracket would require. In the case of corporations, that 15 percent would be far less than the 46 percent top rate.

Put all together this kind of a program would cut spending by $60 billion. It would raise revenues by $15 billion. It would cut the deficit by $75 billion in a single year, and provide the clearest kind of signal that the Congress and the administration really mean business about getting these grossly irresponsible deficits off the back of future Americans.

STAR WARS QUIET AND NASTY LITTLE BROTHER

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on another subject, on Valentine's Day, February 14, the New York Times handed the Congress a from-the-heart Valentine—a gift we should honor and cherish, and a first-class, logical editorial that every Member of the Congress should read. It pleaded for an end to the President's proposal to spend endless sums on the star wars antimissile defense. It did so by calling attention to star wars' tiny, quiet, little mouse of a brother. He is the type who does not say much but he has one terrible future. If we do fund star wars, little brother designed to penetrate Russian antimissile defense is going to blow big brother star wars and all its trillion dollars out of sight some day.

The President has asked the Congress this year to appropriate $3.7 billion for star wars research. That sum will double and triple to a total of $25 billion in total in the next 2 or 3 years until it explodes to $1 trillion a little later. Keep in mind that $1 trillion is $1,000 billion. If you like our present deficits, you will adore star wars. As the President might put it: "Baby you ain't seen nothing yet."

That is the big boy. On a smaller scale, the quiet, little mouse of a brother—otherwise know as the advanced strategic missile system—will call for only $174 million in appropriations this year for the 1986 budget. This is about 5 percent or one-twentieth, of the spending for star wars.

The New York Times says that the relative appropriation size—20 times as much for defense to offset the quiet, little brother offense—is about the difference in the proportions we can expect to spend to defend against the Russian offensive missiles and to penetrate Russia's defensive missiles. The Russians can, of course, do the same thing. Any doubt that they will?

Now for anyone who has gone past the fourth grade in school—child arithmetic—the logic of what we ought to do should be clear. If it takes us 20 times as much to defend against enemy missiles as it does to penetrate enemy defense against our missiles, why not maintain the deterrent that has kept the peace by forgoing the costly defensive system and spend only the much smaller sum that will defeat our adversary's antimissile defense? We can save $1 trillion this way. And important as $1 trillion is, there is something more important. We can keep the stable, standoff, mutual-assured destruction relationship that has kept the superpower peace for more than 30 years. We can do this by simply saying "no" to star wars. But can we keep it if the Soviet Union develops even a temporary antimissile defense that could give them a decisive nuclear weapons advantage? We have on the books an answer and a good one right now. The answer, of course, is that since 1972 we have had in place an Antiballistic Missile [ABM] Treaty with the Soviet Union ratified by the U.S. Senate by the overwhelming vote of 88 to 2. That treaty prohibits both sides from developing a star wars antimissile defense or any other antimissile defense. Star wars, of course, would flagrantly and totally violate that treaty. But some say the Soviets have already beaten us to it by violating the treaty with their giant radar complex under construction at Krasnoyarsk since it has the capacity to serve as a component of an ABM system. The Russians deny they are in violation. How about it? Maybe they are. If so we can and should promptly go to the mat with them on this issue.

But in any event no one has suggested that the Russian radar could begin to stem the absolute and total devastation of the U.S.S.R. with at least 100 million human casualties if the United States should retaliate for a Russian attack on the United States. The superpowers have each spent hundreds of billions of dollars to build their mammouth nuclear weapons capacity. Each superpower can boast between 20,000 and 25,000 nuclear warheads. Each country has strategic advantages. The Soviets have greater megatonnage, greater accuracy, far more powerful land-based ICBM's. The United States has a much less vulnerable deterrent with a great deal more submarine-based and bomber-based nuclear warheads. We can deliver our payload on Soviet targets including their ICBM's. They cannot find much of our deterrent because it is mobile and invisible. Each side can devastate the other. We know that. They know it. Mutual destruction is assured. So there is peace, uneasy peace, but peace. Star wars would torpedo that assurance. Maybe, just maybe, star wars could, for a little while, defend specific land-based ICBM's. If so, the technology would be far more useful to the Soviets with 70 percent of their deterrent stationary and land based than the United States with only 25 percent of our deterrent needing this kind of protection. And certainly the assurance of security against nuclear attack would be far less with the uncertainty of a star wars defense—challenged not just by the immense offensive nuclear power now in being on both sides, but by that little, mouseyquiet brother, the advance strategic missile system at a low, very low, cost and designed precisely to penetrate missile defense. So that is the answer? That is easy! First, strengthen and reinforce the ABM Treaty. Second, negotiate an end to both star wars and the Soviet radar defense. Third, work for mutual, verifiable nuclear weapons arms control—just as comprehensive as possible.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial entitled "The Strategic Black Hole" to which I have referred from the February 14 New York Times be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 14, 1985]

THE STRATEGIC BLACK HOLE

President Reagan's "Star Wars" strategic defense program has an unpretentious little brother. It's the Advanced Strategic Missile Systems program, which aims to insure that American missiles could penetrate any future Soviet defense system.

Research for Star Wars will cost $3.7 billion next year, but little brother's only $174 million. That fairly reflects the comparative costs of strategic defense and offense. It mirrors something else too: what the Russians will surely be doing as their first line of response to Star Wars.

Didn't the superpowers come this way before? Yes, in the 1960's, when the Soviet Union developed its Galosh defense system around Moscow. That provoked American strategists to put multiple warheads on each missile, so as to overwhelm the defense and guarantee penetration. Far from leaving the Soviet Union better off than before, Galosh only provoked a more terrible threat.

But the multiple-warheads missile also left its American inventors worse off once the counter-measure was completed. Soviet rockets had always carried much heavier warheads to compensate for their relatively lesser accuracy. But as the Russians gained in accuracy and applied the multiple-warhead technique to their much larger rockets, they created a potentially threatening advantage in land-based weapons—the theoretical chance to lob two or more warheads at every American missile before it could leave the ground.

Now the multi-headed SS-18 in turn is about to leave the Soviet Union worse off than before. It provoked the American MX, a direct counterpart, and revived the American interest in missile defense, which has come to bloom as Star Wars.

The pattern has been constant. Every step forward compels the adversary to respond. And the response, by decreasing security and stability, leaves both sides worse off than before. The vicious circle cannot be broken because the advantage at hand always seems more compelling than the adversary's distant countermeasure.

The shining exception in this dismal spiral was the antiballistic missile treaty of 1972, in which both superpowers agreed to forgo missile defenses. Since nothing drives offense as much as defense, the treaty might have stood as an important restraint.

Instead of building on that restraint, Star Wars would abolish it. When President Reagan started the program in 1983 he implied it would defend cities as well as missiles. Now he's hedging, telling The Times that Star Wars is intended to provide "a good chance of keeping all or at least the bulk of [missiles] from getting to the target." But a less-than-perfect shield is little solace for cities; even 1 percent of the 9,000 Soviet warheads could devastate society. As other officials explain, the main attraction of Star Wars is for missile defense.

So as both sides move toward vast new missile defenses, they will strive to make their offenses more terrible and more certain of penetrating the defense. That little $174 million item in the Pentagon's budget for Advanced Strategic Missile Systems is a reminder of what will happen if the prohibition on defenses is shattered: full-scale development of strategic weapons in every form.

A PLEA FROM A CHILD OF HOLOCAUST SURVIVORS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I recently received a letter from Mr. Michael Korenblit, executive vice president of the International Network of Jewish Holocaust Survivors. He is the coauthor of the book "Until We Meet Again" which tells the experiences of two teenagers during the Holocaust. The story is of Mr. Korenblit's parents who have willingly shared their fearful and traumatic experiences with him. The book is his attempt to tell people what can happen if we lose our courage and refuse to stand up for what we know is right.

We, as Americans, are refusing to stand up for what we know is right by failing to ratify the Genocide Treaty. The Holocaust represents the most extreme example of genocide. It is not the only one, however. People in various places throughout the world are living in constant fear. Millions continue to face starvation, forced labor, imprisonment, and even death in Latin America, Eastern Europe, and elsewhere. Human suffering and destruction still are major problems that all nations must work to eliminate. By not ratifying the Genocide Treaty, we are limiting the influence we can exert in condemning such practices.

Mr. Korenblit states that our ratification of the Genocide Treaty will show to the world that we firmly believe in and are dedicated to opposing crimes committed against humanity.

Mr. Korenblit sent a letter last month to the entire Senate urging us to ratify the Genocide Treaty. I have been urging this body to take such action for the last 17 years.

Firmly believing in and endorsing the contents of the letter, I ask, Mr. President, unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD so we all can be reminded of the urgency of this matter.

I remain hopeful that the Senate will announce its acceptance of this human rights treaty by ratifying it as soon as possible.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERNATIONAL NETWORK OF CHILDREN OF JEWISH HOLOCAUST SURVIVORS, INC.,
New York, NY, January 11, 1985.

To the U.S. Senate:

I am writing to you on behalf of the sons and daughters of the surviving victims of the Nazi attempt to exterminate the Jewish people.

On October 11, 1984 the United States Senate voted overwhelmingly on a resolution to support the principles embodied in The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. The resolution also declared its intention to act expeditiously in the first session of the 99th Congress to ratify the treaty.

Forty years ago our country, with other members of the Allied forces, liberated the surviving remmants of the victims of the Nazi Genocide, our mothers and fathers. As American citizens we are thankful and proud of the role the United States played in liberating the survivors of the Holocaust, but we are also embarrassed that our country is the only major industrial nation which four decades after the end of World War II has still not ratified the treaty to which the deaths of our families gave its name.

The liberation of Europe and the death camps which inhabited them is a glorious page in American history and must no longer be marred by our failure to join the world community in the solemn obligation to oppose crimes against humanity wherever and whenever they occur. Throughout our history we have always been the leader concerning the issues of human rights. Let us once again step forward for those principles we hold so dearly as a nation. The ratification of the Genocide Convention can not be put off any longer.

I respectfully ask that you insist that the ratification be put to a floor vote as soon as possible and oppose all tactics to delay its passage.

Sincerely,

MICHAEL KORENBLIT,
Executive Vice President.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. RUDMAN. It is my understanding that morning business is extended until 3:30. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. RUDMAN. I thank the Chair.

THE DEFENSE DEPARTMENT AND THE BUDGET DEFICIT

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to address what is justifiably the most significant and far-reaching challenge facing this Chamber—the burgeoning budget deficit and what we can do about it. We in this Chamber are facing fundamental decisions about the role of Government at a time when the Federal budget deficit is projected to exceed $200 billion in this year alone and there is little public support for increased taxes. In doing so, we must not overlook the basic truth that economic stability is critical to our future security. Today, I am offering a proposal which will produce significant savings in the area of national defense without affecting our force posture or readiness.

Four years ago, the United States embarked upon the largest peacetime rearmament program in its history. This military buildup was required to strengthen a defense posture eroded by years of neglect and to help redress the dangerous imbalances which had developed in several key areas between U.S. forces and those of the Soviet Union. During this period, substantial progress has unquestionably been made in restoring our defenses to a level commensurate with our global responsibilities.

Yet, even as the program proceeds, few would deny that threats to our security have multipled and become more complex. Beyond the relentless growth and modernization of Soviet forces, other nations and groups with political interests hostile to our own have acquired the means and increasingly the will to challenge U.S. objectives in various regions. We cannot afford to reverse course and risk undoing the progress that has been made in improving our military strength and modernizing our force structure.

Having said that, it is both a political and fiscal reality that, if real progress is going to be made in reducing the budget deficits, the defense budget must be subject to the same searching examination and restraint that domestic programs have been and are currently undergoing. In this regard, it must be noted that defense spending accounts for nearly 34 percent of the President's proposed fiscal year 1986 Federal budget, exclusive of interest on the national debt and offsetting receipts. While I agree with the proposition that national defense is the first and primary purpose of the Federal Government, what strategic goal is served if we spend ourselves into oblivion in molding a powerful force structure, only to find that the economic and political base required to sustain it over time is in shambles?

Although I generally support the thrust of the Defense Department budget developed by Secretary Weinberger, I believe he has been somewhat deficient in working to identify savings that can be made. Of the $8.7 billion in outlay cuts developed with great fanfare late last year, $1.1 billion is attributable to a proposed 5-percent cut in pay for Federal civilian employees, a proposal which was developed by the Office of Management and Budget and which is to be applied government-wide in the unlikely event it receives congressional approval; $4.1 billion is proposed to be saved by the elimination of a proposed 6-percent pay increase for uniformed personnel, but that is offset in part by the proposed granting of a 3-percent increase on July 1, 1985, for an addition of $500 million to the fiscal 1985 deficit. Finally, $1 billion was saved by revising inflation forecasts. That is a bookkeeping change, not a real savings.

But as Secretary Weinberger points out, it is meaningless to speak to the defense budget in terms of percentages—to debate whether there should be 6 or 3 or 0 percent real growth. At best, such percentages can only serve as vague guidelines. A 1-percent change in the defense budget represents an increase or decrease of $2.9 billion. The wisdom of the change depends on what is being added or cut.

Conflicting claims about the propriety of defense budget cuts are now being made with little or no regard for their impact on force structure or overall readiness. In short, Mr. President, the current debate is unfocused and wholly lacking in clarity. It is high time that Congress, not to mention the media and the general public, begin to address the defense budget and possible cuts from the administration's proposal in specifics.

The basic question, then, is where defense cuts should be made and by how much. Most of the debate thus far has focused on procurement, with suggestions to cancel certain weapons systems and to stretch out procurement of others. While I would certainly agree that each procurement request should be closely examined for cost-effectiveness, the focus on procurement to the exclusion of other portions of the defense budget is a serious mistake. Procurement represents only about one-third of the defense budget. Furthermore, while reducing budget authority for procurement will clearly have an impact on the Federal budget deficit over time, cuts in this area make little contribution to reducing the deficit in the short term. Only about 11 percent of the funds appropriated for the B-1 bomber in a given year are actually spent that year, while 22 percent of the appropriations for the MX missile are spent in the initial year. In addition, procurement decisions usually involve issues of national security, the U.S. negotiating position in arms control negotiations, and related questions of policy. Having been responsible for the cancellation of the Viper, I certainly recognize there can be waste in procurement. But, waste is not the question when debating the MX, the B-1, or most of the other major weapons programs which have commanded public attention, unless, of course, one equates waste with one's perception of mistaken policy.

One aspect of the defense budget which has received virtually no attention in the current debate is personnel, although personnel costs account for at least half of the defense budget. But, it is this area, where a dollar of reduced budget authority leads immediately to virtually a dollar's reduction in the budget deficit, in which the greatest promise for defense savings lies.

With this background in mind, I would like to put forward a proposal which would reduce the budget deficit by about $4.5 billion in fiscal 1986 alone and by about $21 billion cumulatively through fiscal 1988. This proposal consists of three elements:

First, elimination of the 3-percent military pay increase proposed for July 1, 1985.

Second, elimination of the Defense Department's proposed personnel increase this year of 36,000 people.

Third, a 10-percent reduction of military and civilian support personnel in the Defense Department.

The first two elements of this proposal are relatively simple and can be discussed briefly. Eliminating the proposed July 1 pay raise would save $500 million in fiscal 1985, $1.8 billion in fiscal 1986, and $6 billion through fiscal 1988. I do not believe that it is either fair or equitable to provide military personnel with an additional pay increase when civilian Federal employees are being asked to take a 5-percent pay cut. For those who are concerned about the potential impact that elimination of the pay cut would have on recruitment and retention of personnel, I would like to make two points. Military pay, for a given rank, has been increased by 43.6 percent over the last 4 years while inflation has only been 26 percent. It was increased by 4 percent just 6 weeks ago at a time when civilian pay was increased by only 3.5 percent. Finally, a great many soldiers and sailors will get a pay raise within the next year or so as they get a promotion; elimination of the cost-of-living adjustment does not preclude higher compensation.

The second part of the proposal would eliminate DOD's proposed increases in end strength for fiscal 1986 of 25,600 military personnel and approximately 10,400 civilians. The bulk of this increase is for support billets. In my view, the Pentagon can fill those positions they absolutely need out of available personnel. Incidentally, a case that these extra personnel are critically needed has yet to be made to Congress.

The third part of the proposal is to reduce military and civilian support personnel by approximately 10 percent, a reduction in military personnel of 76,200 and in civilian personnel of about 104,600. At the outset, I should state that I have defined support personnel, as it relates to those on active duty, quite conservatively. Support personnel, in determining the base number from which the 10-percent reduction should apply, only includes those individuals assigned to auxiliary and support activities as defined by the Defense Department. Personnel assigned to strategic or tactical or mobility units, again as defined by the Pentagon and other individuals were not included, although a great many of those people are, in fact, support personnel. However, in making the reductions, the Defense Department could make them in any support personnel irrespective of their unit of assignment. Accordingly, the Department would have a great deal of flexibility in making the reductions in active duty personnel and, given normal active duty attrition rates, could achieve those reductions without resorting to layoffs.

With regard to civilian personnel, all were defined as support and 104,600 is about 10 percent of the total. In this area, I am compelled to admit that some layoffs might be necessary.

Even a cursory examination of the Defense Department's use of manpower proves there is a grossly excessive support establishment. According to the Department's own listing of the skills and specialties of enlisted men and women on December 31, 1983, only 258,254 of 1,812,477 or merely 14 percent had combat as a skill. However, 289,861 had their specialty listed as administration and clerks. This is unbelievable. DOD has 31,000 more people trained in filing and typing than it has trained for combat.

Additionally, there are 168,647 supply and service handlers among the enlisted personnel, 534,237 whose specialty is electrical, mechanical, or electronic equipment repair, and 85,446 medical and dental personnel. I understand that we need to provide medical and dental care for our personnel, but to have almost 5 percent of our enlisted personnel engaged in this work in a peacetime situation, not to mention thousands more who are officers—including all the doctors, dentists, and senior nurses—and civilians, seems excessive. Certainly military equipment needs to be kept in good shape. But when almost 30 percent of our enlisted personnel are repairmen, there is something either badly wrong with the equipment being bought or there is excess manpower in this area.

The units to which uniformed personnel have been assigned also leads to the conclusion that there is waste which can be cut. Leaving aside the support personnel that are assigned to the strategic and tactical forces, there are over 752,000 individuals assigned to purely support functions. DOD has 38,500 active duty personnel assigned to "management headquarters"—meaning the Pentagon and similar headquarters. That might not be so bad, except there are an additional 44,800 assigned to "centralized support activities," and yet another 21,800 assigned to "centralized logistics." Then there are 301,300 assigned to "base operating support." This again might not be so bad in and of itself, but one should not forget that the individual combat units stationed at those bases have their own support components. Finally there are 155,200 employed at training facilities, including such well-known facilities as the Joint Military Packaging Training Center and the Defense Equal Opportunity Management Institute.

In addition, there are 311,500 uniformed personnel who are not assigned to any unit. Of these, 74,200 are transients, meaning they are moving between bases or assignments, and 213,400 are students, not including the cadet corps at the three service academies, and trainees—presumably being trained by the 155,200 mentioned before.

The situation is not any better when it gets to civilian personnel. I have already recited some of the numbers relating to uniformed personnel working in support functions. But, it takes an added 522,464 civilians to provide operations and maintenance support for the active duty uniformed services—that is, the same work for which there is a massive support structure in uniform. In addition, DOD has 274,346 civilians working on industrial or commercial type functions such as laundries, depot maintenance activities, public works centers, printing plants, shipyards, and so forth.

Moreover, the Armed Forces have far too many officers. In 1962, the enlisted men to officer ratio was more than 7 to 1. Passing over the Vietnam war and the post-Vietnam reduction in troop strength, the ratio had dropped to 6.5 in 1977. In 1980, the ratio was 6.3. Since that time, DOD has been adding 1 officer for every 3 enlisted men and the ratio has now dropped to 5.9 to 1.

In 1945, there were 12 million men under arms. The Armed Forces was commanded by 101 three-star generals and admirals and 38 four- and five-stars. In 1983, with one-sixth the number of people in uniform, there were 118 three-stars and 34 four-stars. It may be true that there is a need for proportionally more of these high ranking officers in today's professional and more technically complex military, but not seven times more.

The Army has 17 divisions; thus it has 17 command slots for major generals, and a handful of operational staff positions for that rank. How many major generals does the Army have? 140. The Navy has almost 100 times as many captains as it has seaborne command slots for captains and the Air Force has 30 colonels for each squadron command.

But, each of these officers ends up with jobs. The Air Force Systems Command, whose primary responsibility is to define Air Force requirements for and supervise acquisition of equipment, has 10,524 officers, including 34 generals. That is more than twice as many officers as the Federal Department of Education has employees.

All this overstaffing does not, in my opinion, result in a benign situation where there are a few too many people on the Federal payroll. Leave aside the fact that this adds billions to the Federal budget deficit. It also results in a more inefficient and ineffective military establishment. It was estimated last year that 66,000 forms are being filled out every day in just the Navy for aircraft maintenance alone. The Air Force Systems Command has its own division of manpower and personnel which itself is broken down into nine offices or directorates, each headed by a middle grade officer. NBC News reported last month that the abortive raid on the American Embassy in Teheran in 1980 involved planning by 21 different agencies or units using 59 different radio frequencies and 150 code words and call signs. To quote Prof. Edward Luttwak, in his recent book "The Pentagon and the Art of War," which is also the source for some of the statistics I cite:

> In the vast non-combat organization . . . a myriad of separate divisions, offices, "centers," departments, and directorates have divided and subdivided each legitimate function to the point where large coordinating headquarters are required merely to achieve coherence.

It is no wonder that nothing ever seems to be accomplished at the Pentagon, that reforms never get off the ground, that it takes so long for even simple decisions to be made, or that the procurement process is in a state of shambles.

Mr. President, I could stand here for hours and cite additional examples to bolster the contention that the expansion of noncombat support personnel has not produced any increase in the effectiveness of our fighting forces. Secretary Weinberger has stressed that the defense budget cannot be frozen or cut without harming our ability to meet the external threats we face. In general, I share his assessment. The proposal I am offering should, in fact, reinforce the Secretary's goals. It would leave our combat force structure unaffected and probably improve management. This initiative might also contribute indirectly to a marginal increase in combat capability if, when the defense budget cuts inevitably occur, legitimate military requirements are left unscathed. While some will undoubtedly argue that even the reductions I propose are too drastic, the prevalent political and economic realities remain unchanged. We simply cannot continue profligate spending patterns in the defense budget while domestic social programs are forced to accept austerity in the name of fiscal prudence. To do so would be an abdication of our responsibilities; to do so may well mean consigning this Nation to an economic debacle as potentially devastating as a military defeat.

In summary, let no one mistake my intentions. The adoption of this plan will not reduce our fighting force by one plane or pilot, ship or gunner, infantryman or tank. Nor will it affect the growth of the strategic force. Mr. President, in this time of calm before what could be national economic calamity, I urge my colleagues to seriously consider this proposal.

"CIVIL RIGHTS" CAN BE A DECEPTIVE LABEL

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, last week a number of Congressmen introduced something they are calling the Civil Rights Recovery Act of 1985, which is essentially, a rehash of last year's Grove City bill. Some people called last year's bill the Big Brother Act of 1984.

Also last week our distinguished majority leader introduced a version of this legislation which apparently has the support of the administration, and which is very close to the compromise bill worked out in the closing days of the session last year, and which had fairly broad, though not universal, support. I expect that Senator PACKWOOD and others will this week introduce a counterpart to the House bill.

All of this effort is designed to overturn part of last year's decision by the Supreme Court in the Grove City case, a decision which held that aid to one part of an educational institution constitutes aid to the entire institution.

Contrary to popular belief, there is not much opposition to overturning that part of the decision. Indeed, Senator PACKWOOD last year introduced a narrowly-drawn bill which would have done that, and which, I believe, could have passed easily. However, the professional civil rights lobby asked for far more than that, asking for legislation which would essentially destroy the distinction between public and private in the United States.

At bottom, these bills deal with the basic question of that "civil rights" means. In all honesty, I do not believe, Mr. President, that there is anyone seriously arguing that Federal funds should be used to support discrimination in educational institutions or anywhere else in America. But there is a very real question about what eliminating "discrimination" means these days.

Apparently it no longer means treating all individuals equally. If it did, then there could be no support for racial preferences and quotas in hiring or admissions. If it did, there would be no busing just because historic residential patterns have produced schools of predominantly one race or another.

The controversy arises because of an outrageous interpretation of the words "civil rights," which have been transmuted into a talisman producing an equality of result, and not opportunity. That is true as much of "sex discrimination" as it is of discrimination based on racial or ethnic classifications.

In other words, Mr. President, it is no longer safe to support legislation just because it is called a Civil Rights Act, or even a Civil Rights Recovery Act. Such bills should be examined carefully, on their own terms, and their results carefully scrutinized.

That is the tenor of a recent analysis of the Grove City controversy by Mr. Gordon S. Jones, vice-president of the Heritage Foundation. Mr. Jones examines the legislative history of last year's bills, notes that many of their cosponsors had never read them, and urges that before Senators and Congressmen sign on to similar bills this year, they look before they leap.

I found Mr. Jones' analysis provocative and useful, and I urge my colleagues to heed his counsel. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Issue Bulletin in question be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"CIVIL RIGHTS" CAN BE A DECEPTIVE LABEL

INTRODUCTION

I am a cosponsor, but I did not read it before I cosponsored it and I doubt if many of the 63 [other cosponsors] did. I am not even certain if the principals did.[1]

So said Senator Robert Dole last year at hearings on the so-called Civil Rights Act of 1984. He apparently backed the measures, as did many of his colleagues, because they assumed that any bill bearing the civil rights label is worthy of passage. At one time that might have been the case, but no longer. The meaning of the term "civil rights" has been stretched far beyond what logic supports or public policy should tolerate. The definition has come to include quotas, affirmative action, and measurements of racial or sexual composition in student bodies and workforces. Much of this was embodied in the proposed bill to which Dole referred.

While this bill failed to pass the 98th Congress, a version of it is certain to be reintroduced this month as the 99th Congress gets down to work. This new bill almost surely will be based on a flawed interpretation of the meaning of "civil rights." As such, legislators this year should not repeat the mistake to which Dole referred; they instead should read and study the bill before cosponsoring it or voting for it.

BACKGROUND

Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 bars sex discrimination in education programs or activities receiving federal financial assistance. On February 28, 1984, the Supreme Court rules in what is known as the Grove City case that federal scholarship assistance to students subjects the college enrolling those students to Title IX. The Court added, however, that Title IX coverage extends only to the federally assisted program itself—the college's student aid program—and not to the entire institution.

This seemed a correct decision in the view of the statute's plain language and its legislative history. Some federal bureaucrats had extended vastly the authority given to them by Congress and had subjected entire institutions to federal civil rights jurisdiction even if only one part of the institution received federal aid. This, said the Supreme Court in last year's decision, contravened the program-specific language of the 1972 statute.

[1] Senator Robert Dole, Hearings Before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on the Constitution on the Civil Rights Act of 1984, June 5, 1984.

At attempt to overturn the Court ruling, led by Senator Edward Kennedy (D-MA) last April, introduced what they shrewdly, but misleadingly entitled the "Civil Rights Act of 1984." It was said by its supporters that the bill had a very limited aim, simply to overturn the program-specific portion of the Grove City decision. In truth, however, it expanded enormously federal civil rights coverage not only under Title IX, but also under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (banning racial discrimination in federally assisted programs or activities), Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 (banning discrimination against qualified handicapped persons in federally assisted programs or activities), and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975 (banning age discrimination in federally assisted programs or activities).

The bill additionally would have mandated a breadth of civil rights coverage that never before had been introduced in Congress or even advocated by the federal civil rights bureaucracy. Among other things, the Kennedy bill would require numerous businesses and entities never before covered to meet federal guidelines. Few elements of American society would have escaped the jurisdiction of the federal rights bureaucracy, with their quotas, social engineering schemes, and burdensome and costly paperwork and compliance requirements.

This bill was barely analyzed in the House and passed there 375-32. The Senate, however, took much more time with it. As its flaws were recognized and its greatly expansive scope became clear, opposition mounted. Numerous organizations, including the American Farm Bureau Federation, National Grocers Association, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, National Association of Manufacturers, religious school groups and many others, voiced criticism of the bill. Finally, Senator Orrin G. Hatch, the Utah Republican, and others blocked passage.

LESSONS OF THE 1984 BILL

A number of lessons have been learned from what became an acrimonious debate over the 1984 bill. Among them:

(1) The name "Civil Rights" in the title of a bill does not automatically mean it is well drafted or advances civil rights. Even if its intentions are laudable, the bill itself may be seriously flawed.

(2) Bills submitted in the 99th Congress to address the Supreme Court's Grove City decision must be carefully and rigorously scrutinized. There should be no stampede on a matter as important at this. It is not enough to be beguiled by a title and uncritically endorse a bill, as Dole's remark suggests may have happened in the 98th Congress.

(3) Analyses of civil rights legislation by its liberal proponents and lobbying groups must be regarded with skepticism. When independent, objective analysts first began to raise questions and concerns about the unprecedented scope of the 1984 bill, the legislation's supporters derided these concerns. They repeatedly assured the Congress that their bill was a mere technical adjustment to reverse the Court's Grove City ruling. Yet a New Republic article observed on November 26, 1984, that:

[Hatch's] objections to the bill's ambiguous language were legitimate. Even Kennedy conceded that groups and individuals who were not covered prior to Grove City might conceivably have been forced to bear a host of bureaucratic burdens such as federal compliance reviews.

[Moreover, the] initial language of the bill was so vague, and the clarifications by the bill's supporters so many, that a judge could well have had difficulty deciding how to apply the law.

(4) Principled opposition to a "civil rights" bill need not result in political disaster. Ronald Reagan told a news conference in the spring, shortly after the bill was introduced, that the measure went too far. This emboldened lawmakers opposed to the bill. As a result, Senators Hatch, Grassley, Hecht, and Thurmond, Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights William Bradford Reynolds, Staff Director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights Linda Chavez, and others began expressing serious reservations with the bill and exposing its flaws. The bill's backers countered that the opponents would suffer at the polls, particularly among minorities and women. Yet the bill's opponents all did well at the ballot box and Ronald Reagan won 57 percent of the women's vote.

(5) To be challenged in the 99th Congress are the underlying liberal assumptions: (a) that the part of the Grove City decision holding that federal aid to students is federal aid to the college must be affirmed by a civil rights bill and (b) that vast civil rights coverage is today needed. With respect to the first point, a college that refuses all direct federal aid to preserve its independence from government control and merely enrolls students who themselves accept federal education aid, such as Grove City College, ought to be entirely free of federal oversight, even its student-aid policies. Three Justices of the Supreme Court noted that no one had ever accused the college of discriminating against anyone. As for the second point, it is no longer 1964 with respect to equal opportunity for racial minorities nor 1972 or 1973 with respect to equal opportunity for women and handicapped citizens.

CONCLUSION

The Grove City decision gives Congress an excellent opportunity to examine carefully the scope of civil rights laws needed today. Tremendous strides have been made in civil rights. There is a much greater acceptance of the moral imperative of equal opportunity for all citizens.

There also has been a proliferation of other federal, state, and local civil rights laws which protect citizens' rights. In view of this, Congress should question whether there is a need for a civil rights statute to overturn Grove City. Such a law's attendant meddlesome and costly paperwork and compliance inspections, its thousands of words of regulations, its requirements for quotas, color and gender-conscious behavior, and similar schemes by federal aid recipients may well be counterproductive in achieving a society of equal opportunity today.

If Members of Congress respond to the Grove City decision with careful and reasoned scrutiny and a willingness to examine underlying assumptions honestly, a sound piece of legislation can emerge. If they continue to assume that any piece of legislation with the name "civil rights" on it should be passed, the goal of a society where individuals are judged on their merits, rather than on extraneous characteristics may well be set back.

GATSHA BUTHELEZI AND THE ISSUE OF DISINVESTMENT IN SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I recently had the pleasure of meeting Chief Mangosuthu Buthelezi, the Chairman of the South African Black Alliance and the Chief Minister of South Africa's Kwazulu people. Chief Buthelezi and I exchanged views on South African race relations, constructive engagement, and the issue of disinvestment in South Africa. I expressed to the Chief my revulsion for apartheid, and I asked him what the United States can do to help bring an end to this reprehensible system. He told me very frankly that there is a limit to what America or any country can do, but he added that American firms do have an opportunity to help. Chief Buthelezi also stated that, in his view, American disinvestment would hurt South African blacks more than whites. As the Chief states in the attached position paper, "No one has proved to us that the suffering which will ensure within the black community as a result of disinvestment will actually force the regime to effect the fundamental changes which all of us are clamouring for."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Chief Buthelezi's statement on disinvestment be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in its entirety.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ON THE ISSUE OF DISINVESTMENT IN SOUTH AFRICA

(Chief Mangosuthu G. Buthelezi)

Disinvestment or Divestment in South Africa has become a parrot cry amongst those Blacks who imagine that they will by making noises about Disinvestment or Divestment so frighten White South Africa that White South Africa will fall in line as far as human rights, social justice and black human dignity are concerned. Pressures on the South African Regime which are likely to move the Regime into bringing about fundamental changes in South Africa, are welcome. But to exert pressures which do more harm to the oppressed then to oppressors is madness. Gestures of this kind which are too costly to the politically and the economically deprived of this land can be callous in the extreme. No one has proved to us that the suffering which will ensue within the Black community as a result of disinvestment will actually force the Regime to effect the fundamental changes which all of us are clamouring for. It is no use doing things just in order to salve consciences, that we are doing something to bring about changes in South Africa, regardless of whether our pressures do in fact promote real change.

As the economic situation continues to deteriorate it is black people who are the first to bear the brunt of it all. Black people are not only underemployed and unemployed but in the current economic depression, they are the ones who have been retrenched in droves. Black people, to be specific, the African people, are the only race group that is excluded from freely seeking employment in all the metropolitan areas of South Africa without getting permission from the Influx Control Bureaux or Pass Offices. Black people are already very disadvantaged because they are the real pariahs of South Africa.

The African people are the only race group that has to pay for school buildings, and that pays fees which no other race groups pay at Primary and High Schools. All Black people in both urban and rural areas are now cash-dependent. Neither Soweto or any other urban township nor any of the rural Regions of South Africa such as KwaZulu can survive even for one week without cash. Black people have no choice about where they live be this in Urban or rural areas. It is therefore a lot of balderdash for some people to say to you Senator, that American investors should not be involved in the so-called 'Homelands'. These areas were not created by the government, but by history and conquest just like your American Reservations.

The wickedness about government policy is to try to force Black people to have rights and a state only in these areas and nowhere else. This is as evil as saying to Sowetans that they can only have a stake in that government created labour dormitory, which Soweto is.

Areas such as KwaZulu existed (although not as they are today) long before Whites came to this land and they will exist even after we have achieved the freedom we are all striving for. The people who bear the worst brunt of the white jack-boot are in these rural areas, where poverty is worsening as a result of the current economic situation and the fact that economic growth cannot cope with the present population growth.

It is good that the Senator has spoken to various leaders including labour leaders. The labour unions are still trying to find their feet in a new ball game from which we Africans have been excluded for many years.

So there are people who dread the back-breaking job of organising people who try to poach membership of some trade unions to use them as political cattle who must do their political bidding. Some functionaries who help in running some of our trade Unions particularly of other race groups, behave just like Whites behave towards us when they pontificate for members of trade Unions without consulting them, just as Whites dictate to us without consulting us.

So please do listen to what labour leaders say to you Senator, but do bear in mind what I have just said to you. Black workers as black workers have not yet called for Disinvestment or Divestment.

PUPIL PROTECTION RIGHTS REGULATIONS

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on November 12, 1984, the regulations issued by the U.S. Department of Education went into effect, almost 6 years to the day after the President signed Public Law 96-561 containing my amendment which was designed to let parents decide whether or not to permit their school children to be subjected to research and demonstration projects, a component of which is psychological or psychiatric testing, or treatment. It was the purpose of my amendment to guarantee the right of parents to have their children excused from federally funded activities under carefully specified circumstances. The activities we are talking about are nonscholastic aptitude in nature.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I am amazed at the overreaction of educational lobby groups to the Department's regulations. The NEA and the School Boards Association, just to name a couple, would have us believe that if a teacher greets a youngster with a "hello, how are you today," this query is a form of psychological testing because the pupil would have to make a value judgment about how he or she feels. Then, if the student should happen to tell the teacher that they are upset because of a family disagreement that occurred just before the student left home, and should the teacher try to comfort the child that "everything will turn out alright," a form of treatment would be taking place. Apparently, the educational groups contend that because of the Department regulations, parents can demand to be advised before a teacher either asks a child how he or she feels, or before a teacher reassures the pupil that such problems usually are worked out, or teachers should never ask such questions.

Moveover, some of the lobby groups are alarmed because some parents are exercising their right to examine instructional material. That provision of law is not contained in the Hatch amendment, but rather in section 439(a) of the General Education Provisions Act and was in effect long before the Hatch amendment was enacted in November 1978.

On the other hand some parent groups have interpreted both the statute and the regulations so broadly that they would have them apply to all curriculum materials, library books, teacher guides, et cetera, paid for with State or local money. They would have all tests used by teachers in such nonfederally funded courses as physical education, health, sociology, literature, et cetera, reviewed by parents before they could be administered to students. Because there are no Federal funds in such courses, the Hatch amendment is not applicable to them. A number of States do, however, have statutes or State board regulations which do safeguard these parental rights.

Some other parent groups contend that because school districts receive some Federal funds on a formula basis such as impact aid, chapter I, et cetera, when a teacher made test is given that may ask such pupils to make a value judgment on a topic, this would invoke the Hatch amendment. This was never the intent of the Hatch amendment.

Were a school district to use its chapter II funds to establish experimental, demonstration or testing programs, the primary purpose of which is to elicit the type of information proscribed by the Hatch amendment, that activity would fall within the purview of the amendment. A direct relationship can be determined, and Federal funds would be paying for an activity that could be challenged under the Department of Education regulations.

On the other hand, Mr. President, if the chapter II funds were used to pay for a course in citizenship—as authorized by chapter II—and the local school board agrees to allow a political science graduate student whose dissertation project is funded from non-Federal sources to administer a survey—which is actually a test—to the class, and that survey attempts to elicit information about the student's perceptions of politics, politicians, people who work for governments, and so forth, because such questions may cause a student to divulge his or her—or their parent's—political persuasion, a parent may ask to have their child excused, but if refused, the relief, it would seem to me, would have to be on some basis other than the Hatch amendment.

Mr. President, there are also those who would have certain courses, such as sex education, paid for with other than Federal funds, eliminated from the curriculum. They contend that the Hatch amendment prevails because in such courses, pupils cannot discuss the course content without making some value judgments about sexual behavior. Were such a course to be funded with chapter II funds, for example, it certainly would be covered by the Hatch amendment and the Department of Education regulations. If the course is nonfederally funded, the Hatch amendment does not prevail.

The fact that students for whom a school district has received Federal funds on a formula basis are attending a class—such as sex education—does not in and of itself bring to bear the Hatch amendment. Were we to agree that it does, we would also have to agree that there is nothing amiss with any of the proposed legislation to overturn the Grove City et al. Supreme Court decision now before us. That is, at least one of these bills contends that such an indirect relationship can bring almost every entity, public and private, under the full weight of the Federal civil rights reporting and enforcement process.

Let us assume for a moment, Mr. President, that the appeal process established by the Department of Education regulations could be invoked in any controversy between parents and school officials over course content, curriculum—regardless of the source of funding—that would require a student to make certain value judgments, or library materials that are offensive to parents. The Department of Education regulations call for the aggrieved party to exhaust all administrative remedies at the local level before appealing the matter to the Secretary of Education only if the materials in contention are federally funded. I would repeat again, Mr. President, that some States already have statutes covering the right of parents to appeal decisions of local educational agencies in such matters.

Let us also assume, Mr. President, that after having exhausted all of the administrative remedies available to parents at the local level, an impasse is reached between a parent and a school district over a sex education course that is not federally funded. Should the matter be resolved by the Secretary of Education irrespective of the source of funding? Do we really want the Secretary to rule on the appropriateness of the course content? Do we want a Federal official to tell local school boards what is or what is not appropriate curriculum materials? I think not. This would be the first step in the direction of a federally sanctioned national curriculum, something that is anathema to both parents and educators, and at the present time, patently illegal.

Mr. President, the Secretary of Education cannot even exercise control over curriculum content in a program that is federally funded, let alone one that is not. Section 432 of the General Education Provisions Act, clearly precludes any official of the Federal Government from making such judgments.

This provision of the law, which clarifies the application of the Hatch amendment, says:

> No provision of any applicable program (meaning federally funded) shall be construed to authorize any department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States to exercise any direction, supervision, or control over the curriculum, program of instruction, administration, or personnel of any educational institution, school, or school system, or over the selection of library resources, textbooks, or other printed or published instructional materials by any educational institution or school system.

At this point, Mr. President, it is important to note that the proscription against Federal involvement as outlined in section 432 first came with the National Defense Education Act of 1958. About the same language as quoted above is also found in the Job Training Partnership Act, the math/science bill, and in the act creating the U.S. Department of Education.

While I am on the subject of instructional materials, Mr. President, I agree with former Secretary Bell, when he said that we have so "dumbed down" textbooks in an effort not to offend any minority group in this country, that they are bland, uninteresting, and something less than challenging. We have even emasculated Shakespeare. A major publisher's recent edition of Romeo and Juliette—read mostly by high school juniors and seniors—has removed all reference to their love affair and suicide. This in response to pressure from parents who do not want their high school youth to think about such things and who claim that such literature may in part be responsible for the increased rate of suicide in school age youth. Yet those same high school juniors and seniors come home from school, turn on the TV and watch murder, rape, suicide, infidelity, et cetera, at almost any hour of the day or night.

Mr. President, the regulations of the Department of Education are in force; and, as even the Department will acknowledge, they lend themselves to various interpretations. But, for the first time in 6 years, we have some guidelines to work with. Granted, there are some ambiguities and some vague definitions in those regulations, but they should be given time to work. Through experience with them at the local level, the Secretary of Education will no doubt find ways to improve upon them.

In the meantime, Mr. President, I would hope that both the educational groups and some parent groups would not torture the intent of the Hatch amendment or the provisions of the Department of Education regulations. In my judgment, in dealing with their constituencies, representatives of both the educational groups and some parent groups have played the game of "worst possible scenario." It is time to let the rule of commonsense prevail.

THE REVERSE SEQUENCE IN CIVIL LIBERTIES

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Congress of the United States once more has before it legislation ostensibly designed to overturn part of the Grove City decision rendered by the Supreme Court just a year ago. In my opinion, Mr. President, the bills so far introduced go substantially beyond merely overturning a narrow court ruling, but I will leave the analysis of the proposals for another time and place.

However, I have just read a fascinating article by Prof. Aaron Wildavsky of Berkeley which casts light on what is happening with these bills, and why there is so much objection to what is being labeled civil rights legislation.

Writing in the current issue of The Public Interest, Professor Wildavsky notes that in recent years the sequence of civil liberties in the United States has come to be reversed. When civil rights law first gained acceptability and momentum, it was thought that equal treatment under the law would bring equal opportunity, and that those two together would produce an acceptable equality of result.

Over the years, the equal treatment of individuals before the law has essentially been achieved, and equality of opportunity has been greatly enhanced. However, in the minds of some, progress toward an equality of result is still inadequate.

Therefore, rather than waiting for the equality of result to come over time, the sequence of civil liberties is being reversed. Such legislative proposals as last year's Grove City bill, the Voting Rights, Act of 1982, the horrendous provision appearing in last year's cable TV bill, the fair housing bills that are perennially before us, and the whole regulatory thrust toward quotas and affirmative action embody this reversal. What they do is to codify an effects test, under which any evidence of disparate outcomes is prima facie evidence of discrimination under law and in opportunity. Under this reversal of sequence, equal results comes first, and will then produce equality of opportunity and equal treatment before the law.

Mr. President, Professor Wildavsky finds this reversal abhorrent, and so do I. We simply must not move beyond the kinds of procedural guarantees which permit individuals to act freely and advance themselves. To do so we will have to discriminate, we will have to classify by race, sex, and ethnic group. I believe that there is no group in America, black or white, male or female, which wants to go in that direction. I continue to believe in the original sequence, and that we will come closer to equal outcomes by insisting on equal treatment than in any other way.

I commend Professor Wildavsky's article to the attention of my colleagues, and to save them the trouble of looking it up, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE "REVERSE SEQUENCE" IN CIVIL LIBERTIES

(By Aaron Wildavsky)

For a number of years I belonged to the American Civil Liberties Union. To me this membership was part of a commitment to perfecting American democracy. I became a political scientist for the same reason. The two commitments, American patriotism and democratic values, went together. By improving the one—the procedures for participation in political life through protection of individual liberty—the other, America as a force for freedom at home and in the world, would also be enhanced. The combination of a strong national defense, social welfare programs, and civil liberties, as exemplified in the 1940s and 1950s by the New York State Liberal Party (in whose youth division I was active) seemed mutually reinforcing. But that combination, however comforting it seemed in the Eisenhower years, was not to last long.

In the early sixties, while teaching politics at Oberlin College in Ohio, I served for a couple of years on the executive committee of the local ACLU. It was not easy, given our interest in procedures per se, to find violations of proper practice in a liberal arts college town. By moving a few miles away, however, we could come up with a couple of cases of unreasonable search or a few days of possibly unlawful detention. In retrospect, it was an innocent time and I know now, from having read William A. Donahue's The Politics of the ACLU that it was, for me at least, a time of naivete as well.

The ACLU was never what I thought it was, an organization standing up for people whose civil liberties were threatened by the passions of the time. The ACLU has always been what Donahue says it is—an organization committed to a shifting agenda of substative policy change as dictated by the political perspectives of its most active members.

Nor was the ACLU what it "purist" members thought: to refer back to its name, a union of people concerned primarily with civil liberties. Whether it was support for unions in the 1920s and 1930s, the New Deal/Fair Deal social welfare agenda of the 1940s and 1950s, or its devotion to equal outcomes since the 1960s, the ACLU has viewed civil liberties, so Donahue shows, as instrumental to other purposes.

Starting somewhere in the mid-1960s, it became apparent to me that I was out of sympathy with the ACLU. Either it had changed, as I then thought, or I had changed, or both. Saddened by the loss of a sympathetic association, and even, to an extent, a source of identity, I wondered what had happened to it or to me.

To say that organizations must adapt to a changing environment is a cliche. The ACLU is anomalous only in that it is such a classic example of the very spirit—absorption into the dominant values of the time—that the naive like myself once thought it was supposed to counter in favor of eternal verities.

When a group organizes to make demands on government to support the group's economic self-interest, no one is surprised that organizational doctrines change as a means of securing the substantive end of increasing its income. That large oil companies should favor market forces when these produce high prices, and governmental allocation when gluts produce low prices, raises few eyebrows. For organizations like the March of Dimes to seek new diseases to conquer after polio declined, has been a subject of mild amusement. For the ACLU radically to reorient its position on fundamental issues decade-by-decade, so that there is little relationship between what it said 50 years ago and what it says today, is more surprising. Yet this exactly what has happened.

Quotas, anathema in the past, now have become desirable as a form of positive discrimination. (Who remembers when the ACLU taught that the Constitution was color blind?) Balancing competing values—order in society with the rights of the accused—has given way to attacks upon authority. ("Lawlessness," the ACLU now says, "is a direct consequence of the failure of the community.") In briefest compass, the ACLU, once devoted to achieving individual freedom from government restraint, has become a convert to advocacy of governmental compulsion to achieve equality of condition. From defense of individuals differences against government, the ACLU has moved to diminish differences among people—white and black, rich and poor, young and old, authority and citizen, parent and child—the list grows all the time.

Just as the ACLU identified itself with industrial unionization in earlier times, it has in recent years become part of the civil rights movement, the women's movement, and the movement against "ageism" and other "isms" devoted to diminishing inequalities in American life. There has been no conspiracy. No one pushed me out to put the present participants in. Two things happened concurrently: Activists in these other movements moved into the ACLU, and people discomforted by this trend toward support of equal results moved out. The process is self-reinforcing: new policies attract more like-minded adherents. No one has to tell the ACLU membership what to do. They can guess what equality of condition requires, and trial and error tells them what catches on with the people who flock to their cause. What is behind this reversal of values and practices?

THE "ORIGINAL SEQUENCE"

Americans are able to agree about the desirability of equality because they mean different things by it. Equality before the law (or equal rights) signifies that people in similar positions will have similar legal standing, so that administrative and judicial decisions will be uniform and predictable. Equality of opportunity signifies the ability to enter contests of various kinds and to keep the proceeds, providing only that one does not prevent others from trying. Equality of condition (or outcome, or result) means that the resources possessed by individuals and groups in society should be roughly equivalent. Rights, opportunity, and outcomes are worlds apart, so distant in practice that it has proved expedient for many to deny the full extent of the differences.

The much-remarked unideological, or better still, a-ideological character of American political history may be attributed to the denial of these differences. Rather than admit that more of one meant less of another, it has been the special bent of American political thought to claim just the opposite: More of one kind of equality would also lead to more of another. Equality before the law, secured by such devices as extension of the franchise and a Bill of Rights providing procedural guarantees, would help secure opportunity to participate in political and economic life. And genuine equality of opportunity, by preventing government from introducting unnatural inequalities into American life, would produce as much equality of condition as is compatible with the innate or behavioral differences among people or as is necessary to preserve republican government.

American exceptionalism is not just the absence of hereditary hierarchies, though that was (and still is) important. What was truly distinctive, in that it was not found elsewhere, was the belief that equality or opportunity, properly pursued, would lead inexorably to equality of condition. Believing people to have moderately equivalent skills and observing that social and economic conditions were far more egalitarian than in Europe, early Americans thought that competition would increase or maintain whatever equality there was; inequality could not come out of competition, unless, as the Jacksonians feared, government introduced banks, charters, franchises, and other privileges not equally available to all citizens.

Observe the initial sequence of relationships among ideas about equality. They run from equality before the law, to equality of opportunity, and only then to equality of results. Of course, the prospects for republican government were related to the relative equality of condition fostered by American circumstances. America was blessed. In order, as the Declaration put it, to secure these blessings for posterity, this God-given equality was not to be decreased by the kind of distant central executive against which the colonies had so recently rebelled.

Insofar as inequality of condition resulted from differences in the faculty of individuals (but only to this extent, and no further), this was tolerable, expected, and natural, if not entirely desirable. In no way did the varying aptitudes for acquiring property (then considered an attribute or extension of the individual person) seem to threaten self-government. The battles of the party-of-the-country against the party-of-the-king in England were appropriated by the American branch of the British Whig opposition. Without an American equivalent of the King's men in parliament—the hated placemen put there by royal patronage, including the venal sale of offices—neither the English monarch nor his American successors could maintain their preponderance of power. Once these special privileges (the anti-federalists especially feared holders of national debt) were removed, equality before the law would help secure the equality of opportunity that kept sufficient equality of condition so that republican government could thrive.

As soon as it is understood that the historic source of inequality was found in central governments ruled by strong central executives, there need be no puzzle over the lack of a socialist party in America. The stronger the central government—in this time-bound equation, good at least until the Civil War—the weaker are individual liberties. After the revolution was won and its posterity assured by Jacksonian democracy, the United States of America and its Constitution became the exemplar of good (i.e., reasonably egalitarian) social relations. The flag, and hence the social relations for which it stood, was worth defending. Satisfaction with the circumstances of American life reinforced the original sequence. Inequality of condition could be bracketed-off and accepted, provided that legal and political equality were achieved. In this way a separate and protected preserve for civil liberties could be carved out. Of course there was nothing like universal agreement on civil liberties, but those who thought of themselves as civil libertarians could reflect a simultaneous satisfaction with conditions in general and dissatisfaction with flat-out violations of legal and political rights.

THE SEQUENCE REVERSED

But the original sequence—in which equality before the law helps secure equality of opportunity and both, taken together, prevent such gross disparities of conditions as to render republican government suspect—was based on assumptions subject to the ravages of time. The rise of corporate capitalism after the Civil War strained the social fabric. Yet populists could not quite bring themselves to turn against their Jeffersonian and Jacksonian forebears by embracing big government as the antidote to big corporations. Eventually populists merged into the progressive movement, which sought regulation to restore equality of opportunity to the conditions of competition in the face of inequalities fostered by giant capital. It took the great depression and the civil rights movement to raise (and, for some, to answer affirmatively) the question of whether the original sequence needed reversal.

It is the reverse sequence (to use a dramatic term from a quite different field) that characterized the ACLU world view. Increasingly, unceasingly, equality of condition was viewed as a precondition of equality of opportunity.

Driving home the proposition that the most widely espoused principles—equality before the law and equality of opportunity—had been denied to black citizens, i.e., that the powers that be had not followed their own announced beliefs, the civil rights movement legitimated much that it touched, including a focus on group as distinct from individual rights. When a number of its leaders came to believe that equal opportunity would, in their circumstances, lead inexorably to inequality of results, they began to seek policies enforcing equality of condition on a group basis. Their position deserves elucidation.

Under their formulation, equal opportunity may promote inequality of outcomes for individuals but not groups. Their objective is not to alter the range of inequality of results among individuals, they say, but to assure that the same distribution of inequality of results obtains across all relevant groups—whatever that range may be. Therefore, to them, a rough group parity of outcomes is a reasonable measure of the actual degree of equality of opportunity that exists. Thus they argue that no group as such (because it is that group) should be denied significant shares of equal opportunity, measured by equal outcomes compared to other groups. Whether those who hold these views, once group differences narrowed, would accept unequal outcomes for individuals within them, I cannot say.

For others, of course, the present range of unequal outcomes (among both groups and individuals) is too high, and their goal is to narrow the range. It is this view, embodied in the reverse sequence, that I believe currently characterizes ACLU action. Without equality of resources, it was argued, competition for the good things of life was prejudged in favor of those who had more and against those who had less. In order to do better, one had to be pre-endowed with the results of already having done better. Hence positive discrimination. What is more, without this substantive equality, the lack of equal opportunity would mean a denial of equality before the law. The opportunities that equal rights had been thought essential to maintain (for those who had them) or achieve (for those who didn't) instead became the prerequisite. Civil liberties had been turned upside down. The causes—equal rights and equal opportunity—had become the consequences of equal rights. What had been widely agreed—the indispensability of equal rights as a precondition of equal opportunity—was replaced in importance by what had been problematic—securing equal outcomes.

LIBERALISM AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

To this very day, the profound consequences of adopting the reverse sequence remain for those who regard themselves as civil libertarians. The spoken premise had been that people who disagreed about policy outcomes could still agree on process and procedure. The American political system, it was widely held, was legitimated by agreement that its processes accorded with equality before the law, which nurtured equality of political opportunity. Even if mass attitudes did not always favor the Bill of Rights, elites, despite policy differences, would rally around these procedural guarantees. Exceptions, such as denial of the franchise to black people were numbered among faults to be corrected; and they were thought to be exceptions, not the rule. Had this not been so, it would not have been possible to distinguish civil libertarians from other people who differed about the role of government or the kinds of policies it should pursue. The reverse sequence not only sought to diminish differences among Americans in general, it also obliterated the rationale for distinguishing a particular kind of American, a civil libertarian, from any other political actor.

Now we know from casual observation, as William Donahue has shown in detail, that most members of the ACLU were politically liberal as well. In the era after World War II, this meant that they (I would then have said "we") favored governmental action to improve the economic conditions of poor people and the political opportunities of racial minorities. Insofar as the reverse sequence meant adopting the liberal welfare program, it may have been uncomfortable for economic conservatives, but not for those who agree with the substanace. (Allowing substance to mask prinicple was a mistake, but it is not easy for people to see a threat lurking behind those who agree with them on policy.) If the ACLU was becoming more liberal, it must be because liberals cared more than conservatives about the people being hurt—or so I thought in the early 1960s.

In the 1970s, another consequence of adopting the reverse sequence emerged, this one harder to deny. The very government that was urged to achieve greater equality of results was also, by virtue of being in authority, responsible for keeping the deprived down. What else but "the system" (i.e., established authority) denied poor people, racial minorities, and women the equal rights and opportunity that could be enjoyed only by first achieving equality of conditions? The disposition to blame the system led to an anti-authority position. This explains why, amidst an epidemic of strong-arm crime, the ACLU fought to make arrest, detention, and conviction more difficult.

At one and the same time, therefore, the ACLU, responding to the reverse sequence, favored stronger governmental action to reduce inequality while simultaneously attacking government's authority. A long-overdue appreciation of this no-win situation—government in America damned if it did and damned if it didn't—led to my unwillingness to renew my membership.

I do not mean to say that these who were out of symathy did not change at all, and that the ACLU did all the changing. We have less reason to cry foul than I once thought. For one thing, those who joined the organization in the 1950s became active during an aberrant period. The patriotism fostered by the war againt fascism created common ground that gave way when the enemy stood for something other than gross racial, religious, political, and economic inequality. During the conservative Eisenhower era, widespread antipathy to Communism and the Communist party made it unsafe to leap to their defense. Faced with a bipartisan consensus on security matters, the ACLU ducked difficult issues, not least by bargaining with J. Edgar Hoover, head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Of this, the membership knew nothing. What it did know was that in those days the ACLU concentrated almost entirely on procedural rights. Criticism and patriotism still seemed compatible. But the decades before and after this period—when, by default, means were more important than ends—were times in which the reverse was more nearly true—policy ends mattered more than procedural means.

Those of us who felt aggrieved at having our ACLU taken from us were too self-satisfied by far. Since we believed in the pure civil liberties project, and those who displaced us did not, we identified ourselves as the long-suffering adherents of the original creed. So far as it went, that was true enough. But we did not understand at that time (certainly I did not) that the initial sequence reflected a set of preferences about how American society should be organized. We were (and are) no more neutral in our views than current ACLU adherents; the difference (and it is profound) is that what they take for granted—the desirability of equal results, even at some sacrifice of equal rights—is problematic for us, and what we assume—the desirability of equal rights and opportunity, even if inequalities do not hereby decline—has become problematic for them. The separation of legal rights from the maelstrom of social life, which in our own eyes makes us true-blue civil libertarians, makes us in their eyes apologists for unconscionable inequalities. And that (leaving out the "unconscionable") is what is in dispute.

Guilty as charged! Some of us discover that we approve of many aspects of traditional morality and, therefore, of the social hierarchy from which it stems. Acceptance of a modicum of hierarchy, moreover, includes respect for authority as well as other forms of inequality. Others among us 1940s and 1950s civil libertarians discovered that if we wanted the creativity and spontaneity of market forces, we had to accept the inequality (as well as the vulgarity) that went with it. Had we believed that the combination of hierarchy and market relationships that constitutes whatever established authority remains in American life was vicious—leading to cumulative inequalities threatening American democracy along with its civil liberties—we, too, might have considered equality before the law as an epiphenomenon and equality of condition as all that was worth fighting for.

When the ACLU accepted the reverse sequence (some time in the late 1960s or mid-1970s) it also rejected the insulation of law and opportunity from condition. From then on equality of condition was primary and equality before the law secondary.

THE ACLU'S FUTURE

The ACLU has become an adjunct of movements to attack existing authority in the name of equality. If these movements weaken, the ACLU, if its past is any guide to its future, will abandon the reverse sequence and retreat to delineating a privileged position for legal rights. Should these egalitarian movements grow stronger, the ACLU may well become absorbed into them, making manifest what is now latent, namely, its service as their legal arm. Whatever happens, the experience of the ACLU will have taught us something about the conditions for treating civil liberties as an end in itself.

One such condition occurs when civil libertarians are numerous enough to band together, but still so weak as a group as to require tolerance from dominant social forces. Rather than fight losing battles over the substance of policy, this civil liberties group seeks to separate itself and its issues from substantive outcomes. The stance is tactical: The emphasis is on procedures because the group is sure to lose on policy. Once the group is strong enough to enter contests over policy, civil liberties become the means to more important ends. Those who disagree on substance leave the organization; gradually, the end goals overwhelm the former (and expedient) concentration on the means, and the initial sequence gives way to the reverse sequence.

Are there, then, no social conditions that would sustain disagreement over substance in the midst of agreement over procedures? Yes, but these conditions are delicate in that they require a certain kind of balance among forces. There must be people favoring hierarchy, for without hierarchy there is no place for legal rights, universalistic rules, adjudication of who has the right to do what, or predictable responses from government. And to some degree there must be pro-market forces. Without them there would be no one who believed in competition for its own sake. And without people to safeguard the right to switch support, there could be no change in political office. Egalitarians are needed, also, to keep differences—including those between authority and citizen—from growing too large. Otherwise, hierarchies might seek to throttle competition and capitalists to control markets, making it difficult for newcomers to enter. Should any of these social orders grow too powerful (the danger of which Aristotle was well aware), procedural rights would be nullified. Hierarchy might stifle alteration in office and the criticism that goes with it; market forces might create inequalities; and an egalitarian social order might deny liberties on the grounds they would interfere with equality. What the proper balance should be has, to be sure, eluded all of us. No doubt those who promote the reverse sequence would argue there is so little equality of condition that American society could stand for a great deal more before it becomes unbalanced. No doubt others will say that the pendulum has swung too far toward seeking equal conditions. I believe that the reverse sequence, by making civil liberties hostage to prior conditions, will weaken liberty without achieving equality.

To see why this is so—why equal conditions drive out equal rights rather than fully achieve them, as is commonly asserted—consider the coercive qualities required to maintain the reverse sequence. How can it be guaranteed that no citizen or group will acquire an unfair (in contemporary discourse, read "unequal") command over resources? Acknowledging that perfect equality of condition is unobtainable and may even be undesirable, attempting nevertheless to attain it justifies regulation of virtually every aspect of life that tends toward substantive inequality, i.e., most everything. So long as every deviation from equal conditions is regarded as unfair, undemocratic, and therefore, illegitimate, governmental intervention in the interstices of social life is mandated. In do sweeping a conception of democracy, equality before the law, except for instantaneous votes at the moment of achieving equality of resources, is a fatal impediment.

A different view of democracy, not heard from much in recent times, is that people get together to find common grounds on which to secure the blessings of liberty. The initial sequence—the procedural rights they can agree on—matters mightily precisely because people do not agree on substantive ends. They expect to come in with different degrees of interest and information; they expect to be unequal in some respects because they want to be taken as they are; and they think that established positions should give way only slowly, since this resistance to change will dampen their proclivity to do whatever they decide to do. By foreclosing the end, or, rather, by making the end of equal condition the only legitimate beginning of political life, there is no room for a democracy of learning what to prefer. There can only be a democracy of enforcing prior preferences. And that, ironically, renders civil liberties useless, because there are no preferences to be changed. The reverse sequence and the original sequence are antithetic to each other; if you have one, despite what the song says, you can't have the other.

NORWALK'S WOMEN'S CLUB CENTENNIAL

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to formally congratulate the Norwalk Women's Club, from Norwalk, CT, on their 100th anniversary.

For the past 100 years the Norwalk Woman's Club has unselfishly served the Norwalk community and the State of Connecticut. The effort and dedication of these women has extended into the areas of health care, education, scholarship, and civic affairs. Recognized for outstanding contributions in all areas of the arts, the club received the Naoma Morgenstein Award. In addition, two of their members were awarded the CSFWC Outstanding Volunteer Clubwoman of the Year Award. What the club has accomplished in the last 10 years—contributions of over $50,000 to the community and over 60,000 hours of volunteer service—is a demonstrative example of what the Norwalk Women's Club has been about for the last 100 years. And that is a continuous commitment to the betterment of their community through volunteering their time and energies by being in service to others. Believe it or not these women have something in common with Muhammed Ali, who has said that "service to others is the rent I pay for my room here on Earth." I would submit that the members of the Norwalk Women's Club share this same attitude.

During the past few years when we have witnessed massive cuts in social programs, the arts, and education, our communities have come to rely on volunteer organizations to fill the void left by these cuts. I am proud to acknowledge the Norwalk Women's Club, on the celebration of their Centennial, and particularly for the contributions they have made to the citizens of Connecticut. They are a credit to volunteer organizations all over the United States, and their unselfish service to their community during the past 100 years has made a positive difference in the lives of their neighbors and fellow citizens. It has been greatly appreciated.

OPERATIONAL WEAPONS TESTING

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I wish to call attention today to an article by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] which appeared in Newsday on February 5 of this year.

The article concerns the critical need for a truly independent and conscientious office of operational testing within the Pentagon.

We have all heard too many stories of weapons which failed to fire when our troops were in the field, and we continue to produce weapons of questionable worth at astronomical cost. It is understandable that the contractors and contracting officers responsible for developing new systems are less than rigorous in subjecting those weapons to realistic tests under combat conditions, but this sort of negligence is unacceptable to any of us who are concerned with the best interests of our troops in the field.

The Senate recognized this problem in approving the creation of an independent office by a vote of 91 to 5 in 1983. Since then, however, the Defense Department has dragged its feet. Although the new office and its Director were supposed to be in place by November 1, 1983, it was only last week that the Senate received the name of a nominee to head up the operational testing effort.

I hope our colleagues will give special attention to the comments of Senator Hart, and I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR SOLDIERS' LIVES DEPEND ON REFORM OF WAY WE BUY ARMS

(By Gary Hart)

The past year has seen a stream of defense horror stories. Most have been of two types: overpricing or failure to meet specifications.

These are important issues. But there is a risk that concern about overpricing and shoddy manufacturing will distract us from the principal problem with many of our weapons—that even if they are manufactured correctly and priced fairly, they are not likely to work in combat.

One example is the Army's new personnel carrier, the Bradley Infantry Fighting Vehicle. At more than $1.5 million apiece, the Bradley is about 10 times as expensive as its predecessor, the M-113. If if did a better job of keeping the infantry inside it alive on a battlefield, it would be worth the extra cost. But instead, it threatens their lives.

Like the M-113, the Bradley is made of aluminum. When aluminum is hit by a shaped-charge weapon, such as the RPG-7 that is found in every Soviet infantry squad, it vaporizes at the point of contact and creates a fireball inside the vehicle.

Troops in the M-113 can reduce the risk from shaped charges and from mines by riding on top, as they usually did in Vietnam. The Bradley's design makes it impossible to ride on top. The Bradley is equipped with an antitank weapon, which the M-113 is not, but the weapon is a missile, not a gun, which means an enemy tank can usually destroy the Bradley while the missile is still in flight. The Bradley is filled with highly explosive ammunition; soldiers in the Bradley are riding in a powder keg.

When it tested the vehicle last year, the Army reportedly skewed the tests in several significant ways to cover the Bradley's flaws. Such test jiggering is all too common.

The fundamental issue is the way we develop and test weapons. Today our weapons are designed by a combination of large service bureaucracies and manufacturers that are closely meshed with their government customers. Designs are evolved in a series of committee meetings where each element in the bureaucracy, including the "private" design firm, gets to add its favorite characteristics to the system. Then, the same people who have developed the weapon control its testing.

The large majority of weapons programs should involve design competitions, with the military setting not characteristics but performance goals: what they want the weapon to do. Then, the most promising designs should be prototyped and subjected to competitive "shootoffs" or "flyoffs."

After a design is chosen, enough of the system should be built to permit thorough operational testing. But until it passes the tests, no more should be built.

The testers should be fully independent from the developers. Last year an overwhelming, bipartisan majority of the Congress voted to establish a new, strong, independent office of operations testing and evaluation to make certain that we find out about poor weapon designs before they kill American soldiers. But the Reagan administration has resisted truly independent operational testing.

No administration that stands in the way of such testing can claim to be for a strong defense. Strength requires not just more spending, but reform of the current processes. Our great national strength is a system that relies on competition, not all-wise bureaucrats, to ensure a quality product. Until we make our weapons development competitive, and have independent testing to keep the competition honest, more spending is just going to buy more weapons that don't work. The choice is between military failure and military reform.

COSPONSORSHIP OF ANTI-TERRORISM LEGISLATION

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, on January 24, 1985, the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. DENTON] introduced three legislative initiatives that are designed to enhance the security of the United States and its citizens. With the consent of Senator DENTON, I ask unanimous consent that I be added as a cosponsor to these bills, S. 274, S. 275, and S. 276.

Mr. President, last year I introduced four bills on behalf of the administration to address the serious problem of international terrorism. I was pleased that two of those proposals became law. However, additional action can and must be taken to protect our country from the terrorist activity we have seen increase over the past two decades.

It is my belief that the antiterrorism legislation introduced by Senator DENTON identifies appropriate areas for such action and deserves the careful consideration of my colleagues.

I look forward to working with Senator DENTON as we address this important issue.

REACTIVATION OF THE 10TH MOUNTAIN DIVISION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, on April 14, 1945, the 10th Mountain Division spearheaded the Fifth Army's northern Appennines offensive, the drive which was to break the back of the German resistance in Italy. By April 20, units of the division had moved down from the last mountain slopes and out across the plain of the Po Valley, the first allied troops into the vital flatland from the Appennines. Because of the 10th's participation, resistance in Northern Italy ended on May 2. After V-E Day, the 10th Mountain Division was inactivated in November 1945.

As a member of the 10th during World War II, I recently had the honor of participating in the reactivation ceremony of the 10th Mountain Division [light infantry] at Fort Drum, NY. Others in the official party included:

The Honorable PATRICK MOYNIHAN, U.S. Senator.

The Honorable ALFONSE D'AMATO, U.S. Senator.

The Honorable SAMUEL STRATTON, U.S. House of Representatives.

The Honorable DAVID MARTIN, U.S. House of Representatives.

The Honorable SHERWOOD BOEHLERT, U.S. House of Representatives.

The Honorable John O. Marsh, Jr., Secretary of the Army.

Gen. John Wickham, Army Chief of Staff.

Gen. Robert Senewald, Commanding General, U.S. Forces Command.

Maj. Gen. William Carpenter, Commanding General; 10th Mountain Division (light infantry).

I ask unanimous consent that the text of my remarks at the reactivation ceremony be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY SENATOR BOB DOLE—REACTIVATION OF THE 10TH MOUNTAIN DIVISION; FORT DRUM, NY

During World War II, a German General, H. Von Senger, who had fought throughout Europe, declared that the Tenth Mountain Division "was the best division he had faced on any front." After the war, Colonel David Fowler, who commanded one of our regiments said "the tenth contributed more to the downfall of the Germans in Italy than any other division." Even now, when veterans return to Italy, American flags and welcome signs are strung throughout the villages to honor those returning victors.

I traveled to one such reunion when I represented the President last year commemorating the fortieth anniversary of the liberation of Rome. At the time I spoke about the honor of visiting Italy—a nation blessed with the fruits of peace. However, that celebration could never have occurred had it not been for the bravery of the Tenth Mountain Divison, for the tenth, lead by General Ryan, was a unique group of World War II daredevils.

Perhaps if General Ryan had not been so persuasive when he told General Truscott to "give us a crack at the Po" things might have been a little different today. For one who fought in that battle as part of the Tenth Mountain, who spilled some of his own blood and left a bit of himself forever behind, I like to think that no single group played a prouder role in the long campaign that started in Sicily and rolled to its victorious conclusion nearly 600 days later—the prolonged and bloody battle to set Italy free.

OUR GOAL OF PEACE AND FREEDOM

As a second lieutenant and leader of the 2nd Platoon of "I" Company, my goal was to reach hill 913. Today, as a Senator, my goal is to make sure that the peace we fought so valiantly for is maintained—that peace is preserved. It required so much of us, in manpower, in money, and above all, in spiritual and national resolve. Those of us that took part in the fighting bless the subsequent peace. We hail the friendships that grew out of the hostility and we pledged ourselves anew to the cause for which so many gave so much.

This is a day to pause and pay tribute to the soldiers of the tenth who gave everything they had for freedom. No less important, it is also a time to pay tribute to the new soldiers of the tenth. I am confident that you will be worthy of that trust.

The fighting may have ended long ago. Yet the dangers persist. The need for a strong and equitable defense is ever present. So let us resolve: so long as human freedom is threatened, then we will keep our watch. Let us pray that the lessons of the Italian campaign have been learned and that no future wars need be fought.

MAINTAINING OUR WATCH

Soldiers of the tenth, may God give you the strength to do what history tells us is right. Under the leadership of General Bill Carpenter may each of you find the wisdom to do what may be necessary. General Marshall, architect of victory in Europe, may have put it best: "The only way to win a war," he declared, "is to prevent it." Gentlemen, that is a responsibility both of us share.

Thank you and good luck.

THE SALE OF CONRAIL

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, on February 8, 1985, Secretary Dole announced her selection of Norfolk Southern to be the purchaser of Conrail. This selection represents the culmination of many months of intense deliberations on the part of Secretary Dole and others and is an important step toward securing a private sector rail system serving the Conrail region.

Today I am placing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial by Secretary Dole in the Washington Times for February 19, 1985, which highlights the important details of the Norfolk Southern [NS] bid. These details represent many months of negotiations, and the parties are to be commended for their efforts to ensure the long-term financial viability of the Conrail system without further Federal subsidies and a continuation of competitive rail service in the Conrail region and as an important link to other parts of the country.

Questions have been raised about the soundness of the NS bid by competing railroads who fear traffic diversions and a loss of existing competitive service, by certain rail labor and shipper groups who also fear the impact of any such rail merger on jobs and service levels, and by proponents of the public offering as an alternative to selling Conrail to a single entity. On February 27 and 28, the Commerce Committee will be holding hearings on DOT's selection and the sale of Conrail in general, and I and my fellow committee members will be examining the strengths of the NS bid and any such concerns that have been raised. In examining these concerns, we must not lose sight of the obvious strengths of the Norfolk Southern as a railroad company, and of our primary goal to transfer Conrail to private sector ownership in such a way as to ensure the long-term financial viability of a rail network in the Conrail region that will remain an integral part of the Nation's rail system.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of Secretary Dole's editorial be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUTTING CONRAIL BACK ON A PRIVATE TRACK

(By Elizabeth Dole)

Selling government-owned enterprises to the private sector or, as the British call it, "privatization," is an idea whose time has arrived in America. We are very near a major advance for the cause of privatization through the process now taking place to sell the federally owned freight railroad, Conrail. After a thorough competitive bidding process, I have selected Norfolk Southern Corp. to purchase the railroad, providing a sizable return to the taxpayers.

The government has been in the rail freight business since 1976, when Congress created Conrail by combining the Penn Central and several other bankrupt railroads operating in the Northeast and Midwest. Congress intended that the government should help the railroad get back on its feet, to the point where it could once again operate without government assistance.

In 1981, the Northeast Rail Service Act directed the secretary of transportation to prepare and carry out a plan for selling Conrail that ensures viable railroad service to the region Conrail serves.

I have conducted the sale of Conrail with this in mind. My goal in selling the railroad has been to select a buyer that leaves Conrail in the strongest position after the sale, best preserves service to Conrail shippers, and consistent with these criteria, gives the taxpayers the highest rate of return possible. The Norfolk Southern offer fully meets these criteria.

The agreement already negotiated with Norfolk Southern assures that those criteria will be fulfilled. Norfolk Southern has agreed to pay $1.2 billion in cash at the time of the sale, none of it leveraged against Conrail's assets. In addition, any cash in Conrail's account exceeding $800 million at the time of closing will also go to the government.

Norfolk Southern also has agreed to surrender the tax benefits Conrail has received during its period of public ownership. Norfolk Southern will forgo all of Conrail's net operating loss carry-forward benefits, worth about $2.1 billion, and $275 million in investment tax credits. These tax concessions by Conrail's bidders represent real value to the Treasury.

Money is only part of the package that the government will receive through the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. We have also negotiated strong public interest convenants which are specificially designed to protect Conrail service and the railroad's financial integrity during a five-year transition period following the sale.

They strictly limit the amount of dividends Conrail's new owners can receive in any year, and prohibit the payment of any common or preferred dividends above certain amounts of earnings unless a cash balance of at least $500 million remains in the company after the dividends are paid.

The covenants also require, with limited exceptions, that Norfolk Southern maintain Conrail's current practice of high levels of reinvestment in Conrail, and preclude deferral of maintenance. Conrail must give up its expedited abandonment authority and offer any abandoned lines to shippers or short line railroads at 75 percent of net liquidation value.

Norfolk Southern must also continue Conrail's business substantially as it is now being conducted and maintain a controlling interest for at least five years. All current Conrail service agreements with shippers will be continued. Conrail's Philadelphia office will be maintained. Finally, Norfolk Southern must provide certifications of compliance and regular reports and audited financial statements to the government, and all covenants are enforceable in court by injunction. False statements are subject to criminal penalties.

These covenants are of real value to the public. In the absence of these restrictions, the market price for Conrail likely would be higher, but the protections for the shippers and taxpayers would be fewer. The negotiated package nets the best possible return for the taxpayers.

The careful, deliberative sales process we have followed is the best assurance that Conrail will be returned to the private sector as a viable railroad continuing to provide first-rate service at a reasonable cost.

The government and Conrail have reached their intended destination. We have a willing buyer with the resources and capability to run the railroad, and the public has guarantees that ensure long-term rail service to the communities and shippers in the 15 states Conrail serves. It's time for the government to sever its ties with Conrail and give free enterprise the opportunity to direct Conrail into the future.

AMERICAN AIRLINES SERVICE TO SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, there is an interesting phenomenon taking place in our Nation—one which is having a positive impact on the State I represent. As more Americans migrate to the Sun Belt, many of those families are making South Carolina their new home.

Not only are families heading southward, but businesses and industries are drawn almost magnetically to the tremendous growth opportunities which the Palmetto State offers.

Coupled with this migratory trend is a strong and stable economic surge, resulting in greater expansion throughout South Carolina.

Mr. President, I am pleased that American Airlines, one of the oldest and most reputable airlines in our country, has recognized this growth and announced its intention to begin service to cities in my State. We welcome American Airlines to South Carolina and look forward to the safe, friendly and convenient service which they are sure to provide to South Carolinians and visitors alike.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following articles about this announcement from the Columbia (SC) Record and the Charleston (SC) Evening Post be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN AIRLINES TO BEGIN FLIGHTS FROM COLUMBIA, CHARLESTON, UPSTATE

[From the Columbia (SC) Record Jan. 23, 1985]

Airport officials say American Airlines will announce this week that it will begin flights from Columbia, Greenville-Spartanburg and Charleston to the Western United States.

Dick Graham, executive director of the Greenville-Spartanburg Airport, said American Airlines' arrival ends two months of "mutual" recruitment. "They're coming, and I think it's going to be in June," Graham said.

In Columbia, airport director Robert H. Waddle said negotiations have just about been completed with the airline on landing fees and rental space, and he believes American will announce the start of service at a 10 a.m news conference tomorrow.

The news conference is set for Columbia Metropolitan Airport.

Charleston airport officials expect three flights daily to leave the Charleston airport, starting during the spring.

Al Becker, an American spokesman, said the airline will formally announce its plans for entering markets in North Carolina and South Carolina at a 2 p.m. press conference tomorrow at Greenville-Spartanburg airport.

American will offer flights to the West, including Hawaii, California, Canada and Mexico, but none to the Northeast, Becker said.

"Everything we do at American domestically is tied to one or both of our major hubs, Dallas-Ft. Worth and Chicago," he said.

Becker would not confirm the other cities in the Carolinas that will be served by American, although airport officials confirmed negotiations have been under way for some time now.

"We will reveal the entire expansion Wednesday," Becker said.

North Carolina's Fayetteville, Raleigh-Durham, Winston-Salem, Charlotte, High Point and Greensboro, and South Carolina's Columbia and Charleston "are among those that have been rumored" to be part of the expansion, he said.

Becker said he could not estimate how many jobs the airline will offer South Carolinians because jobs will be offered first to current employees. "But there will be some local hiring," he said.

American will not enter the Greenville market offering special rates other than the "Ultimate Super Saver" plan the airline plans to introduce nationwide next month, Becker said.

[From the Charleston (SC) Evening Post, Jan. 23, 1985]

AMERICAN AIRLINES TO BEGIN SERVICE HERE

American Airlines will begin three daily flights from Charleston International Airport beginning April 11.

"The Charleston service is part of a larger expansion in the Southeast under which American also will begin service at six other major Carolina airports—Raleigh-Durham, Charlotte, Greensboro/High Point/Winston-Salem and Fayetteville in North Carolina, and Columbia and Greenville-Spartanburg in South Carolina," according to airline officials.

"Most of American's Southeast expansion takes place on April 11. The exceptions are Greenville-Spartanburg and the Atlanta-Chicago flights, which begin on July 15," they said.

Jerry Jacob, American's eastern division vice president, said today there are four reasons why the airline has chosen to serve markets in the two Carolinas.

"Economic conditions in the Carolinas are generally strong and show excellent signs for the future," he said.

"This region has historically been one of the finest air transport markets in the country. There is room for a large, nationwide carrier like American Airlines in the Carolinas, and the prospects for long-term growth here seem exceptionally bright.

"And, finally, American can bring Charleston—and other communities throughout the Carolinas—a whole new dimension of service to the Midwest, the West, Hawaii and Mexico through our hubs in Dallas/Fort Worth and Chicago."

Charleston International Airport already is served by Delta, Eastern, Piedmont and United Airlines. When American begins service, it will be at the new terminal complex, which is approaching completion and is scheduled to open April 3.

American's Charleston International service will consist of morning, early afternoon and evening flights in each direction.

To the west, the morning flight will leave Charleston at 8:40 a.m., arrive in Charlotte at 9:20 a.m., depart Charlotte at 9:45 a.m. and arrive in Chicago at 10:30 a.m. the second flight will leave at 12:30 p.m., arrive in Atlanta at 1:15 p.m., depart there at 1:57 p.m. and arrive in Dallas/Forth Worth at 3:03 p.m. The evening flight will depart Charleston at 6:20 p.m., arrive in Charlotte at 7 p.m., leave at 7:25 p.m. and arrive at Dallas/Forth Worth at 8:57 p.m.

Eastbound, the morning Dallas/Forth Worth flight leaves at 7 a.m., arriving in Atlanta at 9:55 a.m., departs at 10:20 a.m. and arrives in Charleston at 11:15 a.m. The evening flight from Chicago leaves at 5:35 p.m., arrives in Charlotte at 8:11 p.m., departs at 8:53 p.m. and arrives in Charleston at 9:33 p.m.

The second Dallas/Forth Worth flight leaves at 1 p.m., arrives in Charlotte at 4:13 p.m., departs at 4:38 p.m. and arrives in Charleston at 5:18 p.m.

Dallas/Forth Worth is the headquarters for American, but Chicago is the airline's other major hub airport.

American will also offer Charleston passengers a set of discount fares, including its new Ultimate Super Saver fare.

Between Charleston and Los Angeles, for example, the Ultimate Super Saver will be $129 each way, a savings of $301 from the normal coach fare of $430. Ultimate Super Saver rules include buying tickets at least 30 days in advance and staying at least through Saturday night.

APPOINTMENT OF LT. GEN. LA VERN E. WEBER AS EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE NATIONAL GUARD ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise to call to the attention of the Senate the recent appointment of Lt. Gen. La Vern E. Weber as executive director of the National Guard Association of the United States.

It has been my privilege to know General Weber during the last 15 years of his outstanding career as a leader in the Army National Guard forces of our country. Therefore, I am pleased that, upon his retirement last year, he has entered a new phase of service to our Nation by assuming the leadership here in Washington of the National Guard Association.

During the last session it was also my privilege to acknowledge, along with other Members of the Senate, the outstanding work of the outgoing director, Maj. Gen. Francis S. Greenlief. Today, my purpose is to focus attention on General Weber as he begins his first full year as association director.

A native of Oklahoma, General Weber has had a long and distinguished career of military service. He served with the U.S. Marines during World War II and began his career in the Army Guard in 1948. During the Korean War he served with the 180th Infantry Regiment of the 45th Infantry Division, one of only two National Guard divisions called to service during that conflict.

Upon return to the United States he rose steadily in the ranks of the National Guard, and in 1965, was named the Adjutant General of Oklahoma. During this period he worked closely with former U.S. Senator Dewey Bartlett, who also served as Governor of Oklahoma.

In 1971 he was named Director of the Army National Guard. Three years later he became the head of the National Guard Bureau, which has jurisdiction over both the Army and Air Guard Programs. In 1979 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant general.

Mr. President, after completing service as Bureau head, General Weber was named as Deputy Commanding General for Mobilization of the U.S. Army Forces Command in 1982. More recently, he was military executive of the Reserve Forces Policy Board in the Office of the Secretary of Defense.

During his long military career he has received many awards and decorations, including the U.S. Army and U.S. Air Force Distinguished Service medals, the Legion of Merit, and other high awards.

Mr. President, the National Guard Association is fortunate to have as their new leader a man with the experience of General Weber. I feel sure the Congress will look to him for guidance in National Guard matters, and I personally look forward to working with him in this area during the years ahead.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a press release announcing General Weber's appointment to the Guard Association and a biography describing his military career be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WEBER SELECTED TO HEAD NATIONAL GUARD ASSOCIATION OF THE U.S. STAFF

WASHINGTON, D.C. (NGAUS).—Major General William E. Ingram, president, today announced the appointment of Lieutenant General LaVern E. Weber to be the full-time chief executive officer of the National Guard Association of the United States (NGAUS) effective July 1, 1984. Weber will retire from active duty on June 30 and will succeed Major General Francis S. Greenlief who has been executive vice president of the 106-year-old organization since 1974.

Weber is a former Chief of the National Guard Bureau, the Pentagon agency which is the channel between the Departments of the Army and the Air Force and the states. Since leaving that post in 1982, the Oklahoma National Guardsman has held two high-level Army assignments. He was the deputy commanding general for mobilization at Headquarters, U.S. Army Forces Command in 1982-83. More recently he has been on duty in the Pentagon as military executive of the Reserve Forces Policy Board in the office of the Secretary of Defense. He was the first National Guard Bureau chief to attain three-star rank in the Army.

A native of Lone Wolf, Oklahoma, Weber has been a teacher, a coach, a National Guard administrator and a part-time farmer. He served in the U.S. Marine Corps during WWII and was commissioned out of Officer Candidate School. His service in the National Guard began with his appointment as a second lieutenant in 1948. He served with Oklahoma's 45th (Thunderbird) Infantry Division in Korea as an S-3 (operations officer) with the 2d Battalion, 180th Infantry.

Upon his return from Korea, Weber served in key staff assignments in the 45th Division and rose to be the division chief of staff prior to his appointment as the Adjutant General of Oklahoma in March, 1965. He was promoted to major general in 1966.

As the leader of the Oklahoma National Guard he began to play an increasing role at the national level. He served on the NGAUS Executive Council from 1965 to 1971 and was chairman of the "Weber Committee" which was responsible for a major overhaul of the Association. During 1969-71 Weber became a member of the Army Reserve Forces Policy Committee, an advisory body to the Secretary of the Army. In 1971 he was appointed to the Reserve Forces Policy Board at the Department of Defense level.

He came to Washington on a full-time basis in 1971 when he was named to be the Director, Army National Guard. He was then a major general. In 1974 he was named by President Gerald R. Ford to be Chief, National Guard Bureau, a post he would fill until 1982. He was recommended for promotion to the rank of lieutenant general and confirmed in that grade by the U.S. Senate in 1979. General and Mrs. Weber are residents of Fairfax City, Virginia and Perry, Oklahoma.

FARM FINANCIAL CRISIS

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, as you will recall, the "Minnesota Chill" which gripped Washington during inaugural week was warmed considerably by continuing good economic news on the front pages of the Nation's major newspapers.

According to the Commerce Department, the U.S. economy expanded at a rate of 3.9 percent in the fourth quarter of 1984, resulting in a 6.8-percent gain for the year. That is the most growth the U.S. economy has experienced in any one year since 1951.

Equally positive are the reports on inflation. The 3.7-percent inflation rate for 1984 was the lowest since 1967. And, while unemployment is still too high at 7.4 percent, it is down significantly from the double-digit figures we were seeing a year ago. Overall, a record number of Americans are now at work. Encouraging headlines indeed.

But Americans in heavily agricultural areas of our Nation are reading different headlines. Their newspapers are blackened with reports of a farm economy in crisis.

Just a few weeks ago, for example, Minnesota's rural newspapers were filled with stories of families traveling to the farm crisis rally at the State Capitol in St. Paul.

More than 10,000 people from Minnesota and several neighboring States attended the rally to dramatize their plight and to urge swift action by State and Federal officials. Schools and businesses in more than 30 communities were closed so that students and business people could attend.

I read this week in the Mankato Free Press that farmland values in Blue Earth and surrounding counties have dropped to their lowest level since 1978 and are expected to drop another 10 to 15 percent in the next year. According to the Blue Earth County Extension Director, average farm land values in the county fell more than 25 percent just last year, from $2,300 to $1,700 per acre.

And, Mr. President, I read this week in the Canby News about the closing of Great Plains lumber yards in Clarkfield, Madison, Dawson, and Montevideo. In all, the retailing subsidiary of the giant Harvest States Cooperative closed 38 lumber yards in farming communities last week due to declining sales.

But most of what I have learned about the crisis in rural America was not found in newspapers. The education of this public servant was through face-to-face encounters with troubled farmers, and hundreds of letters, like the following from Correll, MN:

DEAR SIR: I am writing to you concerning the farm crisis and the poor people of America. . . .

I have four sons that have been farming for 16 years. They expanded from the home farm after their father passed away, but they use the machinery together. This year their line of credit has been cut off and they have no where to turn for help . . . Doesn't the legislature realize if farmers get a decent rate of return on their investment the whole country will benefit. Our rural towns are disappearing, mainstreet is losing a lot of their business—so many buildings standing empty. This is a major problem in America and I think you in the legislature better work on it. We all can't come to work. About all we can do is write letters and let you know how serious the problem is.

So, Mr. President, as proud and as pleased as we all are about the overall success of President Reagan's economic plan, we are obliged to remember that economic recovery is not shared by the farmers and small business people in the agricultural communities of Minnesota and elsewhere.

Any constructive analysis of today's farm situation must begin with our $200-plus billion national deficit. Our soaring deficits have had—and continue to have—a substantial impact on the feasibility of proposed solutions to address these problems.

First, consider the impact that the deficit has had on interest rates, certainly one of the problems facing farmers.

At current rates, interest on the national debt is now expected to climb to $171 billion per year by 1988, up from $46 billion in 1980. All that borrowing by the Federal Government cannot help but push up interest rates for farmers, homeowners, and everybody else.

A recent survey by Farm Credit Services in 16 countries in the Red River Valley showed that, for the average farmer, a one point decrease in interest rates would be equivalent to receiving an additional 9 cents per bushel for the crops he or she produces.

In other words, if we would lower interest rates from what many farmers are now paying down to 9 or 10 percent, the average farmer would gain as much as 45 cents per bushel. With today's low commodity prices, that would make a great deal of difference.

Whopping Federal deficits have also contributed substantially to strengthening the U.S. dollar against other world currencies, hurting the marketability of our farm products overseas while continuing to buildup surpluses here at home.

In 1982, for example, a $6 bushel of soybeans cost West German traders 10.2 marks. In 1984, that same bushel at $6 cost 18.1 marks, an 80 percent increase in just 2 years. The same calculations can be made for wheat or corn or any other commodity.

In 1983, when the U.S. price support loan rate for wheat was $3.65 a bushel, this equated with $4.32 per bushel in Canadian dollars to the Canadian producer. In 1984, the United States lowered its loan price for wheat to $3.30, but, because of adjustments in the currency exchange, the Canadian farmer still received $4.32 a bushel for the wheat he produced.

This not only signals the Canadian farmer to increase his production, it also provides an additional margin with which the Canadian Wheat Board can negotiate in order to underbid the United States in Third World markets. It is no wonder that American companies like Cargill are finding it economically—if not politically—attractive to buy their wheat and other farm products from overseas.

Finally, the Federal budget deficit affects the fiscal and political feasibility of addressing the farm crisis in this session of Congress.

Proposals are being made by the administration and others to substantially cut spending on Federal farm programs this year as part of our overall deficit reduction effort. The latest proposals I have seen would slash farm programs by $14 billion over the next 3 years.

The farmers I have spoken with are more than willing to sacrifice farm program benefits in order to reduce the deficit. But there is a better way to reduce farm spending than the proposal circulated by Mr. Stockman, and farmers know it.

Instead of terminating the acreage reduction and paid land diversion programs, I think farmers would like to see them strengthened and applied across the board.

Instead of placing a 5-percent origination fee on CCC export credits, farmers would rather see the lucky person who finds a willing buyer for U.S. commodities rewarded with a 5-percent bonus.

Instead of terminating the dairy program and forcing an end to the livelihood of one of agriculture's hardest workers, farmers would rather extend the current program for 2 more years.

Instead of leaving farmers with no choice but to plant as much as they can, farmers would prefer to see a sodbuster bill with cross compliance features.

Most important, instead of trying to create export markets by reducing loan rates and phasing out target prices, Minnesota farmers would like to see the Government take steps to reduce the value of the dollar in the currency markets. It is not the price of farm commodities that is too high, it is the price of the dollar. It is not $3.00 corn, $4.50 wheat or $7 beans that our trading partners cannot afford. It is the high cost of the dollar. The day this Government reduces the dollar's value to its 1981 level is the day when our farm management problems will disappear.

Mr. President, farmers are a lot smarter than the beancounters at OMB think they are. They know things are getting worse. They know the situation will not straighten itself out. They know Washington and the Federal Government are a major factor in their problems. And they know that the proposals circulating at OMB are only going to make things worse. As an illustration, I hope my colleagues will read an article by John Martens which appeared in the Farm Journal.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be inserted in the RECORD at his point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARE YOU READY FOR $2.40 WHEAT AND $2 CORN?

(By John Martens)

Ah—you can almost feel the pleasant tingle from being "wrapped in the warm blanket of recovery" to quote Presidential candidate Reagan from his "farm" stop in Iowa last September. But wait. Is it from a worn-out electric blanket? You can decide.

Two warnings.—Only certified market-oriented folks with low debt-asset ratios or high nonfarm incomes should continue reading unless seated. And, of course, more than the normal chance for change is involved in the analysis below, since this was written in mid-December. Trial balloons were being released almost daily by the Reagan/Stockman/Block trio. Here's the detail on one set of balloons.

The "no frills" crop plan floated by the Administrator contains:

(1) ending the farmer-owned reserve;

(2) a $10,000 payment limit and a $200,000 CCC loan maximum;

(3) full "recourse" loans set at 75% of the last three years' farm price for soybeans, cotton, wheat and feed grains;

(4) a five-year phase-out of target prices, dropping 5% a year from 100% of the last three-year average farm price in 1986 down to the loan level (75%) after 1990;

(5) a modest conservation reserve designed to idle about 20 million acres of highly erodible land;

(6) all other acre-idling programs would be discontinued (no ARP, PLD or PIK), so all production would be loan and target "eligible."

I've estimated the results in the table for the three key crops. I assumed normal weather, a continued strong U.S. dollar, more big deficits in the $150+ billion area and current interest rates.

It's a "cold turkey" approach. Recourse means you must repay the loan! So the effective price support would drop from the 1985 loan rates listed in the table to nothing! Wow. So there would no longer be a support price for any crop! The loan rate really would be used only by those who couldn't get a loan from normal sources. Who'd want a $1.68 corn loan in 1988—let alone one that couldn't be forfeited!

As the table shows, the five-year "gradual phase-out" of target prices turns into only a two-year removal when practical numbers are used. So, corn deficiency payments would run $5 billion in 1985; about $2.5 billion in 1987; and near $0 in 1988.

Economic consequences of the policy shift described herein are many. Here's a partial list.

Farm exports would go up perhaps 20% by 1987 if prices dropped about 30% as shown. Eventual gains of up to 40% to 50% would be possible if export competitors didn't retaliate.

Food price inflation would be very low until about 1990 as the cheaper raw farm prices worked their way through the system.

Initial farm-income losses of $11 to $14 billion would drop net farm income to $6 to $9 billion by 1988.

Hog prices likely would fall to $30 per cwt. or less in 1987 as farmers tried to "market crops on four legs." Farmers in wheat states like Kansas would have the highest bankruptcy rate.

Severe stress would put increased pressure on farm suppliers.

FmHA failure rates would reach or exceed 80%—leading to the eventual write-off of perhaps $20 billion of the current $25-billion loan total.

The farm credit system probably would fail if Uncle Sam didn't step in.

Perhaps 40% of all farmers would fail by 1988—and these hold over half the $190-billion private farm debt.

Land prices would decline another notch along with cash rents—a structural shift toward direct operations by outside investors would develop due to the tax law.

Soybean prices would still average near 2.4 times corn price—about $4.75 a bushel with $2 corn.

Surviving farmers with good marketing skills and some cash in hand would do relatively well in the '90s—especially if they bought more land and machinery at the bottom of the late-'80s collapse.

With no reserve, food-price instability would become an issue.

Perhaps the "trial balloons" analyzed herein are just that. The immediate removal of price supports with a two-year income assistance phase-out seems radical when farmers already are under severe stress. Both the treasury and trade deficits will need to be trimmed before "free market" policies have any chance of being a "fair market" policy for U.S. farmers.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, it is small wonder that farmers are angered by the proposal to phase out target prices and reduce loan rates over the next few years, when these two farm program elements comprise, in large part, the Government's commitment to agriculture. Moreover, we have heard scant evidence that such grave steps would benefit the farm economy or the Nation.

Minnesota farmers do not buy the argument that it is high loan rates which have made our exports too expensive and have encouraged expanded production abroad. Neither do I. Again, we must look to other factors for the true story.

While current support prices are a factor in the decline of U.S. farm exports, they take a back seat to the impact the strong dollar had had. Today's dollar has increased the cost of U.S. wheat, corn, and soybean exports by 32 percent since 1980.

If Congress adopts the market-oriented approach, we would have to drop the loan rate to $1.70 per bushel just to offset the strength of the dollar. And I cannot think of a single farmer in Minnesota who can pay off his debt with $1.70 per bushel corn. Let me restate that it is the dollar, not the loan rate, that has priced us out of the world market.

And why are we to believe that high loan rates have led to the expanded production abroad? There is not a single leader in the world who does not understand that a stable food supply ensures a stable government. When Presidents Nixon, Ford, and Carter withheld grain from our established customers those nations had no alternatives but to find a new source or develop their own supply. It was embargoes—not $2.45 bushel corn—that compelled our former customers to clear rain forests, irrigate deserts, plow up virgin prairies and plant wheat, corn, and soybeans. Is it any wonder that we have become residual suppliers and our former customers have become our toughest competitors?

The other half of the market-oriented approach—after slashing loan rates—is cutting target prices and deficiency payments. But target prices and deficiency payments perform two important functions for farmers. First, they provide the incentive farmers need to participate in Federal farm programs. Without a meaningful target price, there would be very little participation in Federal acreage reduction and soil conservation programs. And with carryover stocks of corn reaching 1.2 billion bushels and prime farmland silting up our lakes and rivers faster than we can dredge them, this is not the time to cut target prices or reduce the cap on deficiency payments.

Second, target prices and deficiency payments force the Government to accept the responsibility and share the risks when Federal policies fail. If OMB wants to reduce budget exposure on deficiency payments, I would suggest that it start by finding ways to get the value of the dollar down. As it is, if this Government is going to use the agricultural sector to break the back of inflation, it will either have to improve its management of current farm programs or be prepared to spend a little money.

Unfortunately, this administration's management track record is more than a bit shoddy—$600 toilet seats, $10 billion PIK programs, and Allen wrenches worth their weight in gold, do not do much to reduce a deficit that is expected to exceed $200 billion next year. Every farmer I have spoken with believes the Federal deficit is the No. 1 cause of the high interest rates and the strong dollar. They know their problems will not be over until our spending habits are brought under control. And they know that if Congress does not act this year, there will not be a crop to harvest next year.

A Minnesota Department of Agriculture survey has estimated that, without quick action, 13,000 Minnesota farms will fold in the next 2 years. I repeat, 13,000 farms in Minnesota alone. Moreover, studies show that every time a farming operation is liquidated, three jobs are lost. And, every time 10 farms fold, a business on the main street of Jackson, or Elbow Lake, or some other farming community is forced to close. As William Jennings Bryan said nearly a century ago:

> Burn down your cities and leave our farms, and your cities will spring up again as if by magic; but destroy our farms and the grass will grow in the streets of every city in the country.

A businessman in rural Wilmont sent me this letter about the financial crisis in farming communities:

> I have personally owned this retail farm store in Wilmont for seven years. Prior to that, my father owned and operated the business for ten years. In the last two years, the store sales and thus its profits have eroded and our accounts receivable from farmers has grown enormously. Area banks have taken monies received by farmers and reduced loans and paid interest, leaving creditors like me to carry balances for fertilizer, feed, seed and equipment. In essence, the farmers' creditors are financing and carrying balances that should have been paid from the sale of crops and livestock.
> Soybean and corn yields in our area were good, but prices are so low that the monies received by farmers didn't cover the cost of putting the crop in, much less the cost of cultivating, spraying and harvest.
> Area bankers are writing down the values of land and equipment used for security by the farmers. Not only has the farmers' net worth eroded, but they are saddled with paper losses in addition to cash losses on this year's crop.
> I think the survival of many farmers and small businesses is dependent on your taking action immediately. We need low interest rates, an influx of cash, price supports, and breathing room from area bankers, and we need it now.

And there was this letter from Granite Falls:

> As a director on the Willmar branch of the Federal Land Bank I am acutely aware of what is happening to the farm population. As County Commissioner of Chippewa County I am also very much aware of the social problems we are seeing—alcoholism, abuses, depression—with the recent closing of 9 Standard Lumber Yards in the immediate area and 42 lumber yard closings by Great Plains. We are also losing many small independent businesses up and down main street.
> STANLEY JACOBSON
> Granite Falls, MN.

The current farm financial crisis is multifaceted. That is part of the reason it is so difficult to address. It involves the immediate crisis of borrowing money for seed and fertilizer and fuel to put in a crop this spring. It involves the longer term problems that farmers have making their payments and paying their bills with current high interest rates and low prices. And, it involves responding to people, like this woman in Lewiston, who are concerned about their neighbors' welfare:

> DEAR SENATOR DURENBERGER: I am writing to voice our alarm at the deteriorating farm economy. We need fair prices—we cannot continue selling for less than it costs to produce.
> We know of 20 farmers in this area who have lost their farms, or are in the process of losing them. We know six young couples with families who are leaving Minnesota to go to Arizona and Washington because of the sagging farm economy.
>
> Two bankers have been shot and two more have been threatened. How many suicides have there been? How many more banks and small businesses must close before someone realizes there is a serious problem? WAKE UP!
> Lowering prices still further as Reagan and Stockman plan to do will make matters worse. Prices are already below the cost of production. The arms manufacturers are not losing money, although we clearly have a surplus of arms. We can blow up the world several times over—now that's a surplus!
> American family farms are the most efficient food producers in the world. They care for the land. Corporate farms care only for profits. They do not rotate crops and they rely heavily on chemicals and pesticides which are harmful to our topsoil.
> Please work for better prices. The open market isn't working. We need prices which will allow us a profit so we can raise and educate our families and pass our farms on to our children. Our children have all left the farm because they see no hope here.

The current farm financial crisis is, at once, nobody's fault and everybody's fault. It is going to take the concerted effort of all of us—Federal and State, urban and rural—to begin to solve.

Certainly, declining land values are at the very heart of concerns many farmers have about getting the credit they need to put in a 1985 crop.

A recent study by the Minnesota Agricultural Statistics Service found that Minnesota farmers lost $8.9 billion in equity from 1981 to 1984, mainly through the erosion of land prices. In southwestern Minnesota's Nobles County, the total decline in land values in the past 4 years was a startling $352 million. Just in 1984, land values in Nobles County dropped by almost $100 million.

It is no surprise, then, that bankers are joining farmers in the front rows of rallies being held around Minnesota.

According to the Minnesota Bankers Association, Minnesota farmers are now $12 billion in debt with $4 billion of that debt at serious risk of default. An estimated 44 percent of the State's farmers have debt-to-asset ratios greater than 40 percent—the point above which bank examiners start to classify loans as shakey.

Without question, some of these farmers are doomed to bankruptcy. No amount of Federal or State assistance will—or should—bail out a farmer or any other business owner who fails because of poor management, overexpansion, or other factors under his control.

But, despite the callous and exaggerated comments of David Stockman, this current farm financial crisis goes far beyond the poor managers and the farmers who are doomed to failure regardless of what action might be taken. Efficient, otherwise solvent farmers are not being swept under by declining equity positions against loans that could be made payable. Here are letters from two such farmers:

> DEAR SENATOR DURENBERGER: My husband and I live on a four generation farm. We made the poor conditions of the 30's and early 40's but the spring of 1984 the Rossow homestead farm came dollars away from losing the family who cleared the land and built the 100 year old buildings.
> According to every economic guideline, this strong, hardworking, educated family of four is eligible for fuel assistance, food stamps, medical assistance, virtually every level of welfare. We raise corn, soybeans, cattle, hogs, alfalfa, hay, and work 365 days a year since animals, like people, need to be fed daily.

Something is not right in every way of thinking.

The farmer who farms 100 acres of land and provides the food for the nation is then slapped in the face and treated with such disrespect and given an income so low that enables him to apply for and be eligible for every state welfare program available! It's an outrage!

The leaders of this great country better get their priorities into perspective!! Soon!!

DEAR SENATOR DURENBERGER: We are writing to tell you that there are real problems out here.

To start with, we have too many big banks that are buying smaller banks. As soon as they take over the small bank they begin trying to get rid of all agriculture loans.

Second, the lending institution that we are with is 2% higher on interest than they were one year ago. They say this is because of bankruptcies and vulnerable loans. When we cannot pay our own interest how can we pay this much more.

Our boy farmed last year and FmHA tells him they do not know if funds will be available this year or not. It's only a few months until planting time and rent will be due.

Third, there are a lot of families out here being totally shut out. All their income taken away and then they are told it's simply their own problem where their next meal or heat is coming from. We think it's time we worry about our own people's problems.

Fourth, we have a good line of older machinery and our livestock and it keeps getting devaluated to the point that we don't know how long we can hang on.

Fifth, we owned 467 acres. Last year we sold 75 acres to try to hang on. Now the value of the land has dropped so far we couldn't sell it if we had to. We ask you—is this what must happen after 21 years of farming?

We need guaranteed loans made available now and we absolutely need low interest.

Mr. President, who knows what current land values really are? My suspicion is that one reason they have continued to fall is that buyers have backed off, waiting for prices to come down even further.

To me, that suspicion means that we need to find some way to force bank examiners to stop continually devaluing farmland, at least until we understand better where the market really is.

One smalltown banker whom I respect, took the time last week to send me a publication put out by the Iowa Bankers Association dealing with subject of farmland devaluation. An Iowa banker quoted in the publication reported on his recent experience in being examined by the FDIC. He related how FDIC examiners informed him they were writing down all land values to a flat dollar amount on this exam, and that he was lucky because when they come back the next time, land values would be lowered an additional $400 per acre, across the board.

During his review with the examiners, the banker said he was told "We're going to close up these small banks. You're done for. Small towns are out. You might as well get a supply of plywood and be ready to board up your bank and schools within 5 years."

It was comments such as these that led me to schedule several meetings with OMB, Agriculture and Treasury Department officials, including incoming Secretary James Baker. I would like to think those meetings has something to do with the President's pledge to call off the FDIC watchdogs. All the same, the President's pledge will not send land values back to where they were last year. Accordingly, whatever is done to address the problems caused by sliding land values must be done quickly, so that deserving farmers are not prevented from obtaining enough operating capital to begin spring planting. And I would like to say that the President's pledge to extend additional loan guarantees to lending institutions will solve the credit problems, but that remains to be seen. Lenders are still sending producers down the road to the Farmers Home Administration, and this letter from New Richmond explains what they find there:

DEAR SENATOR DURENBERGER: I am writing to you today concerning the depressed economy in rural Minnesota. I support the Republican platform on government getting out of our lives—but government has been involved in the farm economy for 50 years. Now when we need government interference the most, please don't desert us!

My husband and I have been farming for 16 years. Our lending institution will not lend us the money to continue on. If FmHA won't help us we will have to leave farming just as so many other neighbors have had to do the past three years.

I realize balancing the budget is number one, but please don't forget when the farm economy is booming, so does the iron and steel industries; chemical and fertilizer companies; and all the main street businesses in these small communities—which in turn is felt in the metro areas. If help could be given to us today, the government will feel its returns for many years to come.

We are praying that you will hear our cry for help.

But, Mr. President, spring planting expenses are a short-term problem, and it is the long-term credit needs of agriculture that concern me most. No one in Washington, not John Block, not KIKA DE LA GARZA, not JESSE HELMS, not BOB DOLE, seems to have a program to put agriculture on its feet. But, in addressing the longer term cash-flow problems caused by high interest rates, I have been most impressed by one proposal put forward recently by Communicating for Agriculture [CA], a national farm advocacy organization based in Fergus Falls, MN. Although it may cost some money—and, therefore, have to be sold to a deficit-minded administration and Congress—the CA proposal has my full support.

The CA's Modified Debt Recovery Program would assist farmers by buying down interest rates and restructuring loans by extending payments out over a longer period of time. Three existing Farmers Home Administration programs would be modified and incorporated into the CA plan: the Approved Lenders Program, the Insured Operating Loan Program, and the Limited Resource Program.

Local lenders would have a central role in making, servicing, and collecting the loans, reducing FmHA paper work and time requirements. They would have a large stake in ensuring that available resources are properly targeted. Final decisions on farmers' eligibility, use of funds and creditworthiness would remain with the FmHA.

The Communicating for Agriculture proposal has now been endorsed by the Minnesota Farmers Union, Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation, Minnesota National Farmers Organization, Minnesota Chapter of the American Agricultural Movement, and the Minnesota Bankers Association and Minnesota Independent Bankers Association.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Communicating for Agriculture proposal be inserted into the RECORD at this point.

There being no obligation, the proposal was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM DEBT RESTRUCTURING CA MODIFIED DEBT RECOVERY PROGRAM

CA is proposing a farm-debt restructuring plan designed to build on present programs, and target farm borrowers who are in financial difficulty yet who can be helped with the right program.

Today, many farmers find themselves in a financial bind. While about 30% of farmers have little or no debt and are doing well economically, there are between 30% and 40% of all farmers who have substantial debt and are in various stages of financial difficulty.

WHO ARE THESE FARMERS IN DIFFICULTY?

Most agricultural production, about 60% in 1982, comes from 205,000 farms (out of 2.4 million total farms) with more than $150,000 in annual sales. Narrowing our focus somewhat, of these farms with sales of $40,000 to $200,000.

19% have a debt-to-asset ratio of greater than 70%. That means, for every $10 of assets, the farmers has more than $7 of debt;

44% have debt-to-asset ratios greater than 40%;

Farms with debt-to-asset ratios greater than 40% account for 71% of debt on farms in this sales class but only 36% of assets.

For farms in all sales categories with a greater than 70% debt-to-asset ratio, there is little hope of economic survival. In a recent Iowa study, 10% of the farmers fall into this category, hold 9% of the assets and 25% of the total debt.

Farmers with debt-to-asset ratios of greater than 40% are also facing financial difficulties. In that same Iowa study, 28% of the farmers with 30% of the assets and 65% of the debt fall into that category.

The Iowa survey further shows that farmers from all sales/size categories are in the over 40% group and that the majority of these are full-time family farmers.

WHAT IS THE NATURE OF THE FARM DEBT?

Nationally, the total farm debt has increased dramatically. In 1971, total farm debt totalled around $54 billion; in 1976, around $91 billion; and in 1984, total farm debt stands at $215 billion.

Farmers as a group have a much higher debt to income ratio now than in the past. In 1950, the overall debt-to-income ratio stood at less than 1; in 1960, it doubled to 2, changed to over 3 in the early 1970's, to 8 in 1980 and to 10 in 1984. Today the average farmer is trying to support $10 of debt for every $1 of income.

But even more important, the nature of the debt has changed dramatically. Debt today has a much shorter maturity.

Much of the debt is short term with interest rates tied to current loan rates. Even real estate debt is based on variable interest rates or is based on relatively short contract purchases. Maturities on a great deal of real estate debt has moved from 20–25 years in the 1960's and 1970's to 10–15 years or less today.

CAN FARMERS WITH HEAVY DEBT LOADS BE SAVED?

For a substantial segment of the 30% to 40% of farmers who have substantial debt and who are in various stages of financial difficulty, economic survival is a serious question. To help this group, representing between 720,000 and 960,000 farms out of 2.4 million total U.S. farms, there must be a restructuring of farm debt. This group, mostly full-time family farmers, were caught with too much debt at the wrong time, debt that was manageable under the prevailing economic conditions when it was incurred but become a crushing burden when conditions changed.

In the group of farmers, there are many good farmers facing bankruptcy for lack of a way to make the transition from an economy of high inflation, rising land values and low interest rates to one of low inflation, sinking land values and high interest rates.

Many of the farmers in this group can be helped and saved with the right debt restructuring programs.

CA'S DEBT RESTRUCTURING PROPOSAL

In order for farm debtors to pay off debt obligations, a major restructuring of indebtedness will be necessary.

The number one feature of any debt restructuring program is to stretch out principal payments into a manageable debt repayment schedule. The second major feature must provide for a lower rate of interest, and third, for farm lending to continue, the risks must be shared.

The CA proposal utilizes existing FmHA programs and expertise of commercial lenders to accomplish this.

These are the Approved Lenders Program, Insured Operating Loan Program and Limited Resource Program. CA's Debt Restructuring Plan modifies slightly these existing FmHA programs to create a program of modified recovery debt credit.

The heart of the CA debt restructuring proposal is the utilization of FmHA's Approved Lender Program, with some minor modifications.

FMHA APPROVED LENDERS PROGRAM

Under FmHA's Approved Lenders Program, a qualified commercial lender is approved in advance to process FmHA Guaranteed Loans. The approved lender makes the loan, services the loan and collects the loan, thereby reducing the paperwork and time required for FmHA approval of loan guarantees. The lender is responsible for seeing that proper and adequate security is obtained and maintained. FmHA makes the final decision on farmers' eligibility, use of funds, and credit worthiness.

WHO DOES THE APPROVED LENDERS PROGRAM HELP?

In today's farm economy, there are many farmers whose debt-to-assets ratio between 40% and 70% who are caught in a 'credit availability gap.' These farmers are not in serious enough financial difficulty for consideration by the lender of last resort, FmHA. Yet, they do not quite meet the credit standards of private commercial lenders.

This group is a relatively stronger class of farm borrowers than normal FmHA borrowers. The problem for this class of farm borrowers is that their cash flow is inadequate under current high interest rates and low commodity prices, though their basic personal net worth and equity remains relatively strong. The security behind the loan is strong enough to satisfy the bank lender, yet the loan is classified by bank regulators as a classified loan. For the bank, every classified loan reduces the amount of available assets against which credit can be made available, resulting in less credit being available to farm borrowers.

THE FMHA LOAN GUARANTEE PROGRAM

FmHA Loan Guarantees are designed to provide the credit necessary for family farmers to conduct successful operations. The loans are to be used for the purchase of farm machinery and equipment, basic livestock, annual operating expenses and refinancing for authorized operating loan purposes. They may not be used to purchase or refinance land, finance lease costs or exceed $200,000. Interest rates may be fixed or variable and cannot exceed the rate common in the area. The terms of the loan may be up to seven years on basic security. Quality loans may be guaranteed up to 90% while high risk loans may receive less than a 50% guarantee.

HOW WILL THE APPROVED LENDERS PROGRAM HELP?

Utilizing FmHA's Loan Guarantee Program, the commercial lender will have the additional security to make a bankable loan to farmers who find themselves in a "credit gap". The program is not a bailout for lenders. Unless the loan meets requirements, with a reasonable chance for success FmHA will not approve it.

The program will help, first, by making credit available. Second, the banker will use the banks own (pre-FmHA approved) loan forms familiar to both the borrower and the banker, reducing FmHA's paper-handling load. Third, credit will be available on a much quicker basis, assuring that available guarantee loan funds reach eligible farmers as quickly as possible. Fourth, the banker and borrower are familiar with each other, helping to insure that better loans will be made. Fifth, the borrower is most likely to stretch out the loan payback. A commercial lender will normally have a maximum of five years on the loan while under the FmHA Loan Guarantee Program, a maximum of seven years is possible. This extra two years can assist the farm borrower in achieving an attainable cash flow-payback program.

CA'S MODIFIED DEBT RECOVERY PROGRAM

CA proposes to utilize FmHA's Approved Lenders Program and Operating Loan Program to achieve a significant plan for farm debt restructuring. To achieve this will require some modification of each of these programs.

MODIFICATIONS TO THE APPROVED LENDERS AND DIRECT LOAN PROGRAMS

A basic modification to the Approved Lenders Program is to place a maximum rate to be charged on interest. Under the Approved Lenders Program, interest rates may not exceed the prevailing interest rate in the areas in which the loan is made. At present, this interest rate is approximately 14½%.

Under the modified Approved Lenders Program, a maximum interest rate would be set at 2½% above Federal Funds. This would yield an interest rate of 12½% at October 22, 1984 rates.

Clearly, there is a need to lower interest rates in order to create a more achievable positive cash flow-debt repayment plan for many farm borrowers. In addition to the obvious advantage of lower interest rates, by lowering the maximum interest rate which a commercial lender may charge under the Approved Lenders Loan Program, the result will be to create opportunities for additional farm borrowers to take advantage of the Loan Guarantee Program. A lower maximum interest rate will encourage the lender to graduate the borrower to a regular commercial status.

The second basic change in the Approved Lenders Program would help to expand the program to include the commercial lenders' ability to lend to those in the creditability gap.

FMHA OPERATING LOAN PROGRAM

FmHA Operating Loans are made for both operating expenses and farm ownership. Ownership loans may carry an interest rate as low as 5½% and may be written up to 40 years. Operating loans may carry an interest rate as low as 7¼% and may be written up to 15 years. Under the Direct Loan Program, appraisals are done by the FmHA and security in the loan is named and itemized per lender.

MODIFICATIONS TO THE DIRECT LOAN PROGRAM

In order to restructure farm debt, lower interest rates and longer pay back terms will be required to attain a manageable, attainable cash flow for many farm borrowers.

The CA Modified Debt Recovery Program would incorporate into the Approved Lenders Program the use of FmHA Operating Loans in the same manner as the FmHA Guaranteed Loans. The pre-FmHA approved commercial lender would process the paperwork for FmHA Operating Loans, using the commercial lender's forms. FmHA would still have the final say-so on the loan under a shortened turn around approval or denial. Appraisals would be done by the pre-FmHA approved commercial lender or qualified appraiser. The main change in the present FmHA Direct Operating Loan Program would be to share security on a prorated dollar value basis. This last change is important to create an environment where the financial risk is shared and one which will create far fewer complications than the present system of named security.

BLENDED CREDIT ILLUSTRATION

Under the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program, there can be a significant debt restructuring which will assist present financially troubled borrowers who have a stronger asset base yet who can neither qualify for FmHA loans or regular commercial lender loans.

As an illustration: Farm Borrower with $100,000 of indebtedness—cash flow shows $21,000 available for debt retirement.

Example 1—Farm Borrower with Commercial Lender, Loan Term—5 years, Loan Interest Rate—14½%:

Cash Required for:
Principal Reduction	$20,000
Interest Payment	14,500
Total	$34,500
Payment Deficit	$13,500

Example 2—Farm Borrower under Approved Lenders Program (no modifications), Loan Term—7 years, Loan Interest Rate—14½%:

Cash Required for:
Principal Reduction	$14,285
Interest Payment	14,500
Total	28,785
Payment Deficit	7,785

Example 3—Farm Borrower under CA Modified Debt Recovery Program, Debt is divided between Approved Lender Loan and Limited Resource Loan (3A) and Insured Loan Programs (3B):

	Approved lender loan (3A)	Approved lender loan (3B)
FmHA Guarantee Loan	$50,000	$40,000
Loan Term (years)	7	7
Loan Interest Rate (percent)	12½	12½
Repayment required for:
Principal Reduction	$7,143	$5,714
Interest Payment	$6,250	$5,000
Total	$13,393	$10,714

	Limited resource	Insured loan
$50,000 FmHA Operating Loans	$50,000	$60,000
Loan Term (years)	15	15
Loan Interest Rate (percent)	7¼	10¼
Payment required for:
Principle Reduction	$3,333	$4,000
Interest Payment	$3,625	$6,150
Total	$6,958	$10,150
Total Payment Required for:
Principal Reduction	$10,476	$9,714
Interest Payment	$9,875	$11,150
Total	$20,351	$20,864
Cash Flow Balance	$649	$136

From the above example, the Modified Debt Recovery Program has accomplished a significant reduction in interest rates and has extended payments over a longer period of time to achieve a reasonable and achievable cash flow.

The Modified Debt Recovery Program covers the three areas of need: restructuring of debt, adjustment of interest and sharing of risk. The Modified Debt Recovery Program shares the risk by bringing the Government in on a percentage of the Approved Lender Program. Debt is restructured by adding the Direct Lending Program, and interest is lowered with a combination of ability through the Direct Lending Program to lower to a minimum of 7¼% and a maximum of 2½% plus Federal Funds on the Approved Lender portion. The Modified Debt Recovery Program utilizes the assets of the FmHA, the types of funds which are already available and adds the expertise of Commercial Lenders. The Modified Debt Recovery Program would only be in place long enough to carry agriculture through this present period of adjustment.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I wish to point out that the concept of restructuring debt in order to ease cash-flow is not new. We are doing it all the time for Third World countries that have been in danger of defaulting on their debts to American banks. Surely, if we can be that flexible with the governments and private borrowers in places like Mexico, Poland, and Brazil, we ought to be willing to extend the same kind of assistance to our country's hard-pressed farmers.

I realize that these two approaches—trying to ease the effects of declining land values in the credit system, and trying to reduce debt service payments through low-interest rates and stretching out payment schedules—are not the total answer.

They do not do anything about our ability to market soybeans in Germany, or our ability to compete with low-priced Argentine wheat, or the fact that a bushel of corn today brings a farmer less than it did a generation ago.

Hopefully, these and other farm problems can be addressed as the 1985 farm bill is introduced and moves through the various committees of the House and Senate.

We also have to start by acknowledging the responsibility of the Federal Government in addressing the farm crisis that owes much of its existence and severity to Federal policy itself.

I do not have to spend a lot of time explaining to my farm constituents about the impact of past grain embargoes—and the encouragement which various Government agencies and programs have given to expansion and excessive borrowing—and the impact the Federal Government's growing budget deficit has had on interest rates and farm and other exports—and even the push given in the early and midseventies to farmers to expand exports as a way of offsetting our rising trade imbalance resulting from increasing oil prices.

Mr. President, even all other arguments aside, the fact remains that farming is simply too important to our Nation—and our Nation's security—to be allowed to founder. Daniel Webster called farmers "the founders of human civilization"; George Washington observed, "I know of no pursuit in which more real and important services can be rendered to any country than by improving its agriculture * * *." Farming built our Nation, and farming keeps it thriving.

Agriculture is the one major sector of our economy that we do better and more efficiently than anyone else on Earth. It must continue to be a vital and profitable sector of our economy in the years and decades ahead.

We who are elected to represent the people must heed the plea for help from rural America. I am receiving more mail on this issue than at any time in my 6 years in the Senate. I have referred to many of these letters in the course of this speech. If farmers in my colleagues' States are anything like those in Minnesota—and I know they are—the letters are just as heart-wrenching.

In the communications I receive from Minnesota farmers, three themes stand out. The first concern they express is that the rural way of life which has made this country strong is dying. The second concern is over the impact this rending of the rural fabric is having on their neighbors, schools, and churches. And their last concern is always for themselves and their burning desire to continue in the noblest profession known to mankind: farming.

I know, when I read these letters and talk to these fine people, that they are coming to Washington as a last resort. They are telling us in their own way that they took our advice and now they are paying for it.

I know that many of these farmers have wondered if their elected officials in Washington grasp the dimensions of the farm problem. Coming from rural Stearns County, I can believe and understand the problem. Unfortunately, despite my best efforts and the efforts of other Members of this body to inform this administration of the situation, it is clear that very few people in the executive branch truly believe there is a crisis in rural America.

Four times in 3 weeks, the Cabinet Council met to discuss whether there should be any additional Federal action on farm credit. Please note, Mr. President, the Cabinet Council met not to decide what additional Federal response is necessary, it met to decide whether additional assistance is necessary. Well, I am happy that we were able to get John Block and Dave Stockman to admit there is a problem, but I am not convinced their response will help much.

I wish the administration could listen to what rural America is telling me. Pleas like this from Butterfield, MN:

> We are losing our farms out here in rural Minnesota and if it keeps up our towns and churches will be gone too. I have never written a Congress person before but I feel such a sense of discouragement to see people losing all they have worked for. I know there is no easy answer but I also know that our prices are made in Washington.

And this:

> Dear Senator Durenberger: I am writing to you about our concern over the family farm. My husband and I run a 3rd generation family farm. Our livelihood, and that of many around us, is being threatened and our government is the only place we can turn.

We love America and what it stands for and has to offer. It just doesn't seem fair to work 14-18 hour days just to have foreclosure at your heels!

Please know the problem is real and will not go away. The family farm needs more tax breaks instead of discrimination. We need to know our government believes in us or all hope is gone! Yes, we are a minority, but we have a major task—to feed millions.

Even the older, more established, farmers are having trouble making a go of it. These farmers wrote from Pipestone, Little Falls, and Cleveland, MN:

I was discharged from the Army Air Force in October 1945, but never thought I was coming back from overseas to an America such as we have now, especially in agriculture. I doubt if we can afford to plant a crop this spring. We cannot continue to produce below the cost of production. Perhaps it would be best if not one farmer planted a crop regardless of the consequences. I can manage to farm for nothing, but when it's less than nothing we are in great trouble.

I am a 60 year old farmer's wife. Although we are not yet in danger of losing our farm—it would be difficult to sell—and still have enough to retire. I urge you to do what you can to keep the farmland in the hands of farmers instead of corporations as it is in South America. Food will follow the path of fuel when that happens. The food goes where the money is. Coffee is raised in South America and sent to the United States. The people who live in these lands go hungry. Trusting that you understand these things, and realize that our democracy is based on small farms and small business . . .

I am 55 years old and was born and raised on the farm which I now own and operate with the help of my two younger brothers. We have a family type farm and we love it. We all served our country in the Army starting in 1950 through 1956. The trouble started in 1978 with poor crops due to hail, drought and then floods. Then came high interest, and now very low grain prices. (We are facing trouble!) We all need help before it is too late. Our government bailed out Chrysler Corporation and they "made it". I am sure our farmers could also "make it" if they were given the same chance.

The fact is, farmers are hurting and it is our problem. All of us. The despair is expressed in letters from our future farmers; like this young man:

Dear Senator: I think it's time for farmers to get a fair price for his crops, livestock, milk, etc. that we are producing in this country. It seems to me that the prices we are getting for our products never increases, while our expenses for production are constantly on the rise along with our taxes that are foolishly spent by the government.

The young farmers today must be able to borrow money at lower interest rates! This could be done by reducing the federal deficit. If the deficit was lower it would reduce the amount of money the government would have to borrow, making more money available to small businesses and farmers.

In the future, I planned on a career in farming, but the way things look now, I think I should switch and become a politician!

And from clergy:

Dear Senator: Greetings and God's blessings on your work, especially for agriculture.

Today, I write you and plead help for all farmers.

1. Help them all, to get loans.
2. To be able to borrow money for their farms.
3. Make a good profit.
4. Have a voice in farm issues.
5. Get a reward for their labors.

I totally trust you will help all farmers.

Thanks and God bless you.

Sincerely in Him, Our Father,

SISTER MARY ELIZABETH BORN.

And from our rural business people like this resort owner in Osakis:

Dear Senator: I am very concerned about what is to come of rural America. What I am seeing as I travel in our area is a very depressed economy. Farmers and businesses making less money, and paying more for the necessities of life. Last summer less people were able to afford the recreation of our lake and facilities. Meaning less revenue available to everyone. I'm afraid of what may come to be this summer. I hate to see my friends hurting so badly; the survival of their businesses and therefore their incomes are a big (?). The resorters may go bankrupt as well.

And from farm wives:

Dear Senator: There must be a just price for our products so we can pay our way and start reducing the debt. When consumers understand what is actually happening to the families that have been producing their abundant and cheaply priced food, I feel they too will support a fixed price in order to answer plentiful future food supplies.

I am a farm wife and am painfully aware of the stress it is causing in our own family and in the families of many others in our area.

Your thoughtful consideration of any form of legislation is of the utmost importance. To stop all support, would be a disaster for rural America—businessmen, schools, churches, families, etc. all are interrelated.

The displaced farmer would be highly skilled and would in turn displace city workers, only adding to the unemployment, crime, etc. Other problems of the overburdened city.

And from concerned city dwellers:

Dear Senator Durenberger: It is urgent for the people of Minnesota to make some basic changes in priorities. The immediate and most urgent need is to assure the preservation of family farms in our state. The family farm is basic to our way of life in all of the rural areas and the smaller towns and cities of Minnesota. We cannot afford to let these farms fail without experiencing a devastating loss in the Twin Cities as well. We pride ourselves on being the state with "the government that works". This farming crisis plus other somewhat less urgent, but still very important, problems will provide the test of whether or not we will orient our priorities to secure the foundations of our interdependent society.

There are many more letters I would like to share. I ask unanimous consent that a number of letters I have received from farmers and other Minnesotans be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, the crisis in rural America seems apparent to just about everyone in the upper Midwest. I have tried to communicate this fact to the Comptroller of the Currency, the Chairman of the FDIC, the Administrator of the Farmers Home Administration, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Treasury, the Chief of Staff of the White House, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and finally, to the President himself. But my letters, requests and calls for help have gone unheeded or ignored. My colleagues in the Senate have done no better, and there is no pride in universal failure.

So I will ask once again that this administration and this President go out and see what is happening to rural America. See what is happening to farmers, businesses, and bankers, to families and to an entire way of life. Ignore me if you choose. But do not ignore them. Theirs is a plea for the survival of an industry and a nation.

The following are letters, or excerpts from letters, received by Senator Durenberger concerning the farm crisis in Minnesota.

"We are farmers. We have problems. Over the past year our problems have been multiplying faster than we believe. In the beginning, we were having trouble with the cash flow on our farm. On the advice of our banker we went to the FHA to apply for financial help for next year. Our problems are no different from hundreds of other farmers in America. We planted good seed, we fertilized, we cultivated, we harvested our largest corn crop in our history—and we are going broke. So we went to FHA hoping for some temporary help to get us back on our feet. We filled out all the forms, checked everything over, redid others, and returned everything to the FHA as soon as possible. On December 11, we found out that we hadn't even applied for help! We had only applied for permission to apply. FHA also told us that they only had half the money available this year that they had last year. And our names are now quite far down on the list.

"My husband and I feel we have been misinformed, misled and just generally jerked around by our government. Before the election we were told that there would be special funds authorized to help farmers. So why does the Martin County FHA only have half the funds they had last year: We do not need a quarter of a million dollars to keep us in farming. Our banker told us that if we could get a break on high interest rates and a longer term loan to get our cash flow moving better, we could make it. We are not making high land payments, we rent from my husband's father who charges a fair rent. The only things that are strangling us now are the rising option costs, the high interest rates, and the low crop prices. We hear nothing from FHA.

"Waiting to hear from FHA is bad enough. Since the first of the year our problems have become more immediate. We have no income. The bank can loan us money for livestock and small farming bills, but that is it until we hear something from FHA. We have been looking for jobs since October. Once I was told by the Job Service in Fairmont that they only had twelve jobs in their job box. Twelve jobs! We have applied to every industry around here that is still taking applications. I am scheduled to take a test for the Minnesota Merit system next Saturday. What else can we do?

"We have since borrowed all the remaining cash value of my husband's life insurance policy (about $400). When that is gone, I don't know what we will do if we are unable to find jobs. The sad thing about this whole situation is that our position is not unique. We are one of a growing number of small farmers who are beginning to believe that our government regards us as so much chaff. The general consensus is that no one cares. We hear nothing from our government that makes us believe that people in Washington really know what's going on out here. Please don't misunderstand me—most farmers (including ourselves) do not want handouts and welfare and security blankets—all we want is a relief from interest rates before they eat us up and a chance to do what we do better than anyone in the world—farm. We also want the same rights that the inner-city poor and the immigrants have—a chance to get help to feed our families when we absolutely can't get money anywhere else!

"When a worker is laid off, he is entitled to unemployment insurance. Well, in effect my husband has been laid off—with two crucial differences—he still does all the work, but someone else gets all the money, and he is not entitled to unemployment insurance or welfare. There is no safety net in this great country for farmers.

"There is a growing anger in this area—a frustrating, almost debilitating anger about things over which we have no control. The budget deficit, the crop prices, the operating expense—we are helpless to fight these things. On top of all these problems, now we have to worry about feeding our families!

"I have read of one farmer who only had a gallon of milk left in his refrigerator. I have read of another who could only afford to eat once a day. I read these articles and I wonder if the farmers have children. I think I am so fortunate because I still have some meat in my freezer and I still have some canned goods left from last summer. But when the meat is gone and the canned goods are eaten and when my children (who have allergies) get sick and I don't dare take them to the doctor because I'm afraid he'll ask me for money that I don't have—what then?

"Senator Durenberger, this problem certainly deserves immediate attention from somebody. We live in one of the richest areas of the richest nations on earth and we are worried about our children going hungry. I was raised to believe that a person who worked hard could succeed. Well, we have worked hard and we did succeed—we raised great crops. But great crops sold in November to pay off loans do not feed the family in January. It does not make it easier to bear to know that there are many other similar and even worse positions. I am a mother. Mothers are selfish for their children. When the meat in the freezer is gone, when the canned goods are eaten, when the last of the insurance money is used up—what do we do then—eat cake?" Ormsby, MN.

"As an Attorney practicing in the heart of a farm community, I have a chance to see on a day to day basis the status of the farm situation, and I can positively state that it is not good. In fact, as well as each of you gentlemen stay in touch with your constituents, you may not fully realize or understand the seriousness of the problem. As a conservative Republican, I do not at all consider myself an alarmist, but I do believe myself to be a realist. I certainly want the budding Republican emergence to continue, and accordingly I feel it is imperative that a workable farm program be developed this coming year. If not, I can foresee some real disaster overtaking Republicans in the farm states in the coming years." Marshall, MN.

"Something has to be done. You must be aware of the farming situation, but if you are not I will inform you. The farmers are losing money every year and have been for the past five years. The cost of putting in a crop is more than we receive when we harvest it and try to sell it, and that is without taking a wage.

"What is going to happen to the rural communities and small businesses? What is the situation going to be in 15 years when my son is making up his mind on what to do with his life—or won't there be a choice? I thought this country stood for Freedom. Well if it keeps going the way it has been, there are going to be a lot of people disappointed in the government officials that we elected. We can't do it alone, we need your help and we need it now." Vesta, MN.

"We have completed our income tax and found that we worked all year, produced an average crop and had a loss of $5,000.

"We have farmed about 500 acres for 37 years. We have equity in our business, so interest rates are not our problem, we did not buy new equipment, and still we operated at a loss. The reason has got to be the unfair prices we are forced to accept. The Reagan Administration's cheap food program, and the strong dollar in foreign countries, unfair marketing, are all part of the problem.

"The farmer has not caused these conditions, but they have cut the farmer out of business, and with the farmer many rural merchants and laborers.

"We recommend that you get busy and back price supports which will give us cost of production + a fair profit. If the farmer gets a fair price, he can handle the taxes and the interest. If the farmer prospers, the whole country prospers. We need help now!" Madison, MN.

"We are writing you in response to the PIK Disaster Loan Program, controlled by the Small Business Administration.

"We are a small grain company with four elevators in (X) County which are eligible for the loan. However, our main office and parent elevator is in....., an ineligible county, making the whole company ineligible for any part of the loan.

"What we would like to know is why we are not eligible for the loan? What does a county line have to do with need? Besides the lost income, we have had to tie up a large percentage of working capital to purchase the PIK corn stored in our facilities. This loan is exactly what we needed but were denied. Is the SBA to help businesses in need, or are they to help only the businesses which meet asinine, bureaucratic requirements?" Name and city withheld.

"Things are getting so tough in our community and in the surrounding area that we have taken a collection at church for money, food, and clothing to help those in desperate need. The economic trouble in our rural community cuts across all occupations, ages, and income classes. Big farmers and small, bank vice-presidents and assembly line workers, retired couples and mothers with five children on A.D.C., all of these persons are being hurt by the rural crisis and cutbacks at the federal level.

"The charitable work of our church and others is helpful, but in a sense only a bandage on the severe wound of problems that now face rural America. High interest rates on loans, lack of foreign trade, low commodity prices, and decreasing land values have taken their toll on farmers and their rural neighbors. Some of this was brought on by farmers themselves. But the banks, the market, and the government also share in the fault. The inconsistent agricultural policies of the federal government have certainly contributed to rural communities' problems." Dundee, MN.

"Interest, land taxes and poor prices are killing us. I applied for an FHA operating loan in October and I received a letter in January 18. The letter said I was eligible for an operating loan, but there are not any funds available. Are there going to be funds allocated? As farmers we need funds to operate. The Nixon, Ford and Carter Embargoes have brought us to the ground. We don't need any more. I pay my cash rent on March 1. I am not asking for a handout, but we need operating funds." Butterfield, MN.

"I'm writing to you to appeal for your help. The American farmer needs help. You say, just a small part are in trouble. If you think 30%-50% of the farmers in Martin County is a small part, then there's no need for you to come and see. Even the farmers that owe no money or very little are having some trouble—there's just no or very little profit in agriculture.

"Do you realize the price of soybeans is the same today as it was 10 years ago? Is the price of machinery, repairs, seed, fertilizer and chemicals the same? You know darn well it isn't.

"Interest is about double what it was then, that's part of our problem. All of our input costs are way up, but income the same or less, it just doesn't work.

"Farmers don't now or never have wanted a handout; all we want is a chance to make a decent living.

"At this time we need much lower interest rates, some additional money for operating loans, and better grain and livestock markets. Long-term we need better exports of our products, higher markets, interest rates in balance with everything else, and some lower input costs. I feel most of this can be done by Congress now.

"We've had to cut our spending, why can't the government do the same and cut down the deficit?

"You, the President and all city people better stop and think—if agriculture stays sick will the economy ever get completely well? We're still the backbone of America, maybe 2 percent or 3 percent of the vote but, 40 percent of the economy one way or another. Wake up now or it will be too late." Granada, MN.

"I am writing this letter to express my concern for the future of family farming. It seems as farming numbers drop, so does our importance with Congress. Rural America has reached a crisis stage and if farm programs are phased out, many more family farm members will go with it. I hope you have seen our attempts at reaching the American public with the U.S. solidarity movement and the closing of small businesses in the rural towns. I hope that you can work towards a bipartisan solution of balancing the budget and devaluating the dollar. Possibly we should be looking more to a gold standard than having our dollar be the standard that other country's currencies are measured against. Also, I have no problems paying income tax if I have made money, so raising income taxes does not bother me. Best of luck in attempting to solve a very complex problem." Windom, MN.

"I feel I must write a letter in support of the farmers of which I am one. Please support us and do what you can. I don't know the answer but I do know interest rates have to come down and prices for our products have to go up. I pray that you will do all you can to help us in our time of need, which is now." Lamberton, MN.

"I have been farming eight years, seven of which have been on a farm I bought. I have never made any money at it, but have been able to keep on farming until now. I am financed through Farmers Home Administration, which has been a big help in obtaining my farm, and for yearly operating expenses, except to today! Because of low prices, my cash flow shows objectionably to F.H.A., and thus no financing for putting in 1985's crop. So thus another family farm is forced out of business. How many more, until there is no return." Rural Jackson, MN.

"The Family Farm is a Family Heritage. This year my family's farm is a century farm. Farmers in southwestern Minnesota desperately need your help to survive due to the low prices for our farm products, high interest rates and farm foreclosures. Conditions in the rural areas were never this serious. All we ask is a fair price plus a reasonable return for our work and investment in an effective workable farm program to help keep the family farm." Windom, MN.

"We enjoy farming very much but at this time we don't know for sure if we're going to be able to keep our farm for another year or not. We support our community but we are having hard times. It seems by the time we pay our bills there is barely enough money left over for groceries. The interest payments are getting harder to make. This year we have no cash flow to work with. The farmers desperately need lower interest rates and higher prices. Something needs to be done to help us keep farming. We are looking to you for some kind of help. We need it desperately to keep on farming and so our children can farm. Our small towns and small farmers need help now. We need some kind of help to keep on farming even one more year. Please help support the farmers!" Wabasso, MN.

"Our personal net worth has dropped to 25% of what it was 5 years ago. Five or six years ago we wanted to help a son get started in farming. There was no land for sale near here. The only place we could even look was 50 miles away. It was like that back then. Just nothing for sale. Today there is land all around us for sale. Now we don't even have buyers. Please don't leave budget director Stockman with the farm program. We need someone that is concerned with helping farmers keep farming." Morton, MN.

"We live on a family farm and firmly believe they must be saved. The large corporate farms are the very worst thing for the community. A Congressional meeting of some kind would be a good way to start and for our elected officials to learn firsthand about it. The new farm bill must do something to help the family farmer." Currie, MN.

"This is perhaps the hardest letter I've ever written. First because I don't see the paper through the tears in my eyes, and second, because I am so full of anger and sadness that I can't put my thoughts into words.

"If something isn't done soon, a whole way of life is going to disappear. I'm sure many people can tell you better than me about how things are here. All I can tell you is that we aren't even farmers and we have to sign up for welfare today. My husband is a small business owner and along with him, every single other small businessman is hurting because the farmer is our number one customer.

"We will be moving from our hometown soon if something doesn't happen because we don't want to live on welfare and we don't want our kids living in poverty. I am so sick of everyone saying how the economy is better when towns are dying more everyday." Slayton, MN.

"I am from Boyd, a small community in southwestern Minnesota. In the past few months we have lost our fertilizer plant and the State Bank of Boyd was closed by the FDIC. Many farmers have nowhere to turn, and in my opinion, we must turn to you. One study has shown that by 1986 one third of Iowa farmers will fail. Suicide rates are skyrocketing. The suicide rate in some Iowa counties is twice that of the national average. This is tremendously shocking! We, as farmers, must pay the price for our seed, machinery, and repairs but must take what we are offered for our products. This cannot continue. We need to receive a fair price for our products. Without those prices the family farmer faces extinction." Boyd, MN.

"What is needed is direct and immediate action to raise the prices for 1985 commodities. The only institution that can deal with the need for immediate action is the U.S. Congress. We don't want another PIK, but we need a sensible, long-term set-aside program which will cut or bring production into line with use and demand. At the same time, we need to reach an agreement with Canada and other competitors which will cause them to also cut production. Taxpayers will accept such a program if they can see land on each farm that is put into long-term conservation use. Such a program also has to have 'teeth' in it." Boyd, MN.

"I feel you must cut government spending! You must lower the interest rates! You must get us better prices for our farm products! If we farmers don't get this, we will all be on welfare! I don't think you understand how serious this problem is!" Westbrook, MN.

"I know you know that the general economy is booming. And I know you know that the ag economy is faltering, but do you know that we're bleeding to death out here?" Lakefield, MN.

"What is left in your home state without agriculture? Tourism, hi-tech, education, government employees—but our number one industry is agriculture.

"Don't you think it's about time all of you in Washington cooperated to come up with a solution for a critical problem, one that won't go away by itself? Only you folks can come up with the bold strokes necessary to solve this one, and it has to happen now.

"Please before it's too late for a lot more folks than those directly involved in farming, get it together and take care of America." Jackson, MN.

"We are a farm family in southwest Minnesota by Worthington. Have been on this same farm for 25 years.

"Now we're told we can lose everything. If we could get some decent prices for our crops and they would bring the interest rate down, things sure would look brighter.

"It would be nice if we farmers could set our prices like everyone else does.

"I wonder what will happen if all the farmers lose everything? Then the big corporations will come in and then what?" Fulda, MN.

"All of a sudden everyone is concerned about the plight of the family farmer as though this problem cropped up overnight. With high interest rates and commodity prices at below cost of production, what did they expect?

"Agriculture is the largest single enterprise in the U.S. and when it's in trouble, the country is in trouble. Subsidies for a family unit are a small price to pay for the stability we seek. Limit subsidies to family units, of say, $100,000 gross and let the free market control the rest. It would cost a lot less than it is costing now, and if large operations want to set up family units, OK. If not, let the market prevail. This is the only way we will always have abundant food, soil preservation, and a strong country. Perhaps it's too simple, that is why it has never been tried." Zumbrota, MN.

"I am writing this letter as a plea for your assistance in supporting the family farmer. We don't have years left to avert this crisis—we have only a few short months if we are going to save thousands of small farms in 1985.

"Family farming is a way of life and source of income for millions of people who work the land and who want to preserve it for future generations. In addition to providing a way of life for millions of farm families, other jobs and businesses can flourish in rural areas. If farmers are forced off the land, this, in turn, will close down small towns with their banks, businesses, schools, and churches. Thousands upon thousands of jobs will be lost.

"Family farmers have a respect and love for the land and are proud of the heritage that is theirs. Our family farm is now in the fifth generation, dating back to the pioneer settling of Minnesota. This demonstrates many years of hard work with long hours of toil and hardship to preserve one of the country's most valuable resources—the family farm." Rochester, MN.

"I am reaching the age of retirement (60) and don't think I'll be on the farm long enough to reach the age of 62. Land prices and machinery prices are so inflated that there won't be any money left to satisfy the creditors. Inflation back in the 1970s made the price of land and machinery worth more than you paid for it. In turn, labor and prices of products we purchase went sky high and today products we purchase have not dropped despite the fact that our goods and commodities have deflated 50% and more. Interest rates are so high and the margins so little that there is no profit to be made.

"In 1974, farmers paid a great deal in income taxes. Today, they pay little. Just imagine what it would do to the federal deficit if our leaders would realize how important it is for agriculture to prosper. This is our only renewable resource." Rushmore, MN.

"I am writing this letter because I don't think you people who we elected to represent us understand the problems of agriculture or you do not care!

"If you wanted a strong country, you would fight to keep the smaller family farm instead of promoting big corporate farming and big business, our churches and schools and main streets would be strong and self-supporting, when corporate farming takes over we will lose our pride and incentive to work efficiently. When the big corporate farmers farm the land, they will demand a price and that will be the end of "cheap food" and our freedom.

"I was born and raised here and have lived on this family farm for 46 years. I am trying to buy the farm from my father so at least one of my sons can farm, but it appears to me that the government does not want the family farm to stay in business!

"It seems to me that our President and our leaders have more concern for what is on the other side of the world than our problems right here in this country! Also, Mr. John Block is the poorest excuse for a Secretary of Agriculture this country has ever had!

"Every time we have a election you people are out campaigning for our votes, now where are you when we need you?" Fulda, MN.

"I am a farmer from west central Minnesota. My wife and family and I have owned and operated a 200 acre farm for the last 10 years. The last four years we had some weather problems, but mostly high interest rates and low commodity prices. It became impossible for us to continue farming.

"I have found a buyer for my farm and now am unable to sell it because of USDA's reversal on FmHA sales directive in late December.

"The buyer, my FmHA supervisor, and myself had put together a plan where I would deed the farm to FmHA and then the buyer, who is also an FmHA borrower, would buy it from FmHA. We have studied the different ways open to us and this one was about the only one that would work for us.

"A December 18, 1984 FmHA directive said that no properties could be sold until further notice. We had planned to finish our transaction in the first part of January when our supervisor discovered that he could no longer help because of these new rules." Clenwood, MN.

"We cannot continue to operate at a loss so that the people of the nation can eat. You are not subsidizing the family farmer to any great extent. We are subsidizing you. Last year, we received a deficiency payment of $1,284.36. This year, we had to pay back. Then, to hear that they want to limit the payments to $200,000 per farm. I would suppose these little payments go to family farmers like John Block and his friends. We do not want handouts. We need a price for our product which will give us a profit so that we can purchase those things that we need for our farming operations as well as personal needs." Currie, MN.

"I don't think any of you people in the legislature know how serious the farm problem is. There has to be something done. It should have been done years ago. One thing is to get the interest rate down and to stop foreclosures. All we ask is a fair price for our products—the same as other industries get and we can make it." Pipestone, MN.

NUCLEAR TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER TO SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would like to call attention to a letter which I received from Secretary of Energy Donald Hodel regarding pending requests from U.S. firms for authorizations to transfer nuclear technology to South Africa pursuant to 10 CFR part 810 of Department of Energy Regulations.

Last October 31, Senators PROXMIRE, CRANSTON, and I wrote to Secretary Hodel outlining the reasons why we believed these requests should not be approved. Any authorizations for the transfer of nuclear technology to South Africa would not only ignore resolutions passed by the IAEA and votes taken in the House of Representatives and the Senate on amendments to the Export Administration Act. They would also undermine U.S. efforts to broaden support for the Non-Proliferation Treaty [NPT] and overall U.S. nonproliferation efforts.

In his reply dated February 1, 1985, Secretary Hodel said that the specific applications in question remain pending until the completion of interagency review. However, he added that progress toward our nonproliferation goals has been made by South Africa and that such progress will continue to be possible so long as a productive dialog can be maintained with countries not accepting comprehensive safeguards. As examples of progress by South Africa he cited its resumption of discussions with the IAEA regarding safeguards at its new commercial enrichment facility as well as an announcement that it will conduct its external nuclear affairs in a manner consistent with the spirit, principles, and goals of the NPT. Secretary Hodel did not respond to our concerns about the importance of U.S. acceptance of IAEA resolutions or about the risk of undermining U.S. efforts to broaden support for the NPT treaty.

Mr. President, I fail to see how the mere resumption of discussions with the IAEA on safeguards or a unilateral, nonbinding statement of intent to abide by the spirit, and not the letter, of the NPT could in any way be sufficient to justify nuclear technology transfers to South Africa. Rewarding partial, inadequate measures such as these by approving the pending 10 CFR part 810 requests would not cause South Africa to sign the NPT and accept full IAEA safeguards. It would tell the South African Government, as well as other potential signatories, that they can have their way without signing the NPT and without accepting full safeguards. Moreover, it would represent gross insensitivity to the strongly held views of the IAEA, the U.S. Congress, and world public opinion on this issue.

I hope the administration will consider all of these factors and will decide not to approve the pending requests for nuclear transfers to South Africa.

I request that the full text of both letters be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF ENERGY,
Washington, DC, February 1, 1985.

Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
U.S. Senate.
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY. The Department of Energy is pleased to respond to your letter of October 31, 1984, regarding pending requests from U.S. firms for authorization, pursuant to 10 CFR Part 810, to assist a South African electric utility.

At this time, these specific Part 810 applications remain pending, and we are awaiting the completion of interagency review. However, we would like to take this opportunity to detail the concerns which the Department and other U.S. Government agencies address in their consideration of these applications.

Implicit in your letter is the view that decisions regarding the subject requests should be in the best nuclear nonproliferation policy interests of the United States and that possible adverse consequences for overall U.S. nonproliferation efforts and the Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) regime should be avoided. We certainly agree with you on these points. As with previous Administrations, it remains this Administration's objective to seek to halt the spread of nuclear weapons, to urge adherence to the NPT, and to encourage nonnuclear weapon states to submit all their nuclear facilities to safeguards inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). The Department of Energy's decision regarding any Part 810 request will always be made in consideration of these objectives, and only after careful and extensive examination of each case. This examination includes technical and policy reviews by the Department, as well as review by five other federal agencies.

The fundamental question on a Part 810 request for any country is whether the activity should be considered inimical to U.S. interests, including our nonproliferation interests and objectives. A request is approved only if we judge the activity will not increase the risk of proliferation and will further U.S. nonproliferation efforts. Such approvals are subject to the concurrence of the Department of State, whose judgment is also based on our overall foreign policy interests.

In the case of South Africa, our nonproliferation goal has been for South Africa to submit all of its nuclear facilities to IAEA safeguards, and the Administration has frequently urged it to do so. Progress has been made to broaden the application of safeguards in South Africa, and to encourage it to participate in the nonproliferation regime. As a result of our dialogue on nuclear matters, South Africa has resumed discussions with the IAEA regarding the application of IAEA safeguards to its new commercial enrichment facility. In another major positive step, South Africa announced in January 1984 that it will conduct its external nuclear affairs in a manner that is consistent with the spirit, principles, and goals of the NPT and the Nuclear Suppliers Group Guidelines. This includes requiring IAEA safeguards on all South African exports of uranium, sensitive technology, and nuclear equipment. This kind of progress continues to be possible so long as a productive dialogue can be maintained with countries not accepting comprehensive safeguards.

These are some of the reasons why the Administration opposed the amendments to the Export Administration Act which would have precluded all Part 810 activities in countries without comprehensive safeguards, regardless of the possibility of expanding safeguards coverage in the country concerned.

While we may disagree on specific tactics and measures to achieve our goals, I hope we can agree that a principal U.S. concern must be to work toward the adoption of comprehensive safeguards by countries such as South Africa. The Administration is striving diligently to achieve this goal. We appreciate receiving your views on these matters, and we will take them fully into account in our review.

Sincerely,

DONALD PAUL HODEL.

U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC., October 31, 1984.

Hon. DONALD P. HODEL,
Secretary, Department of Energy, Forrestal Building, 1000 Independence Avenue, SW., Washington, DC

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: We are writing to you and to the Secretary of State to express our concern about the possibility of future authorizations by the Department of Energy (DOE) for transfers of nuclear technology to South Africa pursuant to 10 CFR Part 810 of the Department's regulations. We understand that at least 10 requests for specific authorizations for U.S. firms to provide assistance to South Africa's Koeberg nuclear plant are currently pending and that future requests are possible. For the reasons set forth below, we firmly believe that your approval of any of these requests would be highly inadvisable and would not be in the best nuclear non-proliferation policy interests of the United States. Accordingly, we request that no such approvals be given.

As you know, the members of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) at the 28th General Conference in early October passed by a 57-10 vote a resolution calling on IAEA member states to "end all nuclear cooperation with the South African regime, and, in particular to terminate all transfers to South Africa of fissionable material and technology which could be used for developing the capability of producing nuclear arms. . . ." That resolution clearly indicates the strength of world sentiment that now exists against such trade with South Africa.

The resolution also repeats a call made in a similar resolution passed a year ago urging South Africa to submit all of its facilities to safeguards inspections by the IAEA. We are greatly dismayed that the United States, represented by Ambassador Richard T. Kennedy, voted against the resolution.

Mr. Secretary, the call for comprehensive safeguards in these resolutions is completely consistent with votes taken in the House of Representatives and the Senate on amendments to the Export Administration Act. The amendments prohibit certain nuclear transfers to non-nuclear weapons countries unless they have an agreement for cooperation with the United States and have agreed to safeguards inspections of all their nuclear facilities. These affirmative legislative actions clearly convey the intent of Congress that an agreement and comprehensive safeguards should be prerequisites for certain transfers, including those specifically authorized by the Department of Energy.

There are several additional reasons why U.S. approval for the pending requests involving South Africa should not be given.

First, U.S. trade policy should expressly favor signatories to the NPT, not those that refuse to sign it. Any such approval to South Africa would show that the U.S. is indifferent to the distinction between trading with nations that are a party to the NPT and those that are not.

Second, there may be negative consequences for the United States if future approvals are given. Recognizing that the United States needs and should be seeking all the support for the Non-Proliferation Treaty that is possible, we are surprised and concerned about the Administration's continued willingness to approve technology transfers to South Africa. We are concerned that serious and careful thought may not have been given to the possible loss of support for the NPT by other African nations in direct response to approvals for South Africa. Many nations, as we have seen in the case of the recent IAEA resolution, strongly protest all nuclear cooperation with South Africa and are willing to continue their opposition.

Furthermore, such approvals could also pose grave and adverse consequences for the Non-Proliferation Treaty Review Conference scheduled for September, 1985. Any such approval, in our view, would not only be unwise, but also inconsistent with the Administration's express objective to seek new signatories to the NPT. The Administration has given a high priority to progress in the upcoming NPT Review Conference; such approvals would complicate positive U.S. efforts at a particularly inauspicious time. Indeed, if any individual nation or bloc of nations were to drop its adherence to the NPT, the effect could be catastrophic both for the Review Conference and for the future of the treaty itself.

Finally, we must consider the political implications of this issue in the broader context of U.S. relations with South Africa. In light of the recent massive campaign of violent repression in South Africa, that has resulted in over 80 deaths and 2,000 arrests of black opponents during the past two months, this is precisely the wrong time to provide any nuclear cooperation to the white minority regime in South Africa.

Clearly, in view of the considerations outlined above and the possible adverse consequences for overall U.S. non-proliferation efforts and the NPT regime, any approval of the pending requests would be wholly inappropriate and not consistent with the intent of Congress.

Again, we urge you not to approve pending or future requests for transfers to South Africa under these circumstances. Thank you for your consideration in this important matter. We look forward to hearing from you soon.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM PROXMIRE.
ALAN CRANSTON.
EDWARD M. KENNEDY.

SENATE RESOLUTION 50: SAVE THE JOB CORPS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, on January 24, I introduced Senate Resolution 50, a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate that the Job Corps program has been a cost-effective and successful effort to assist disadvantaged young men and women in obtaining and holding employment, that the Senate's commitment to the program should be reaffirmed, and that no significant reduction in the level of the program should be made. Since I introduced this measure, Senators BAUCUS and FORD have joined with me as cosponsors.

When I introduced Senate Resolution 50, Mr. President, I noted that it was in response to reports that the Reagan administration would, in connection with its fiscal year 1986 budget, propose to reduce significantly and then completely eliminate this valuable initiative designed to assist the neediest youths in finding jobs and improving their lives. Those reports have proven to be the case.

Indeed, the President's budget proposes that funds available for the Job Corps Program in fiscal year 1986 be used solely for the purpose of shutting the program down, terminating staff, and closing centers. And on what does the Reagan administration justify the termination of this important program? In short, it is based on a completely misleading and inaccurate assessment of the program.

Mr. President, I want to quote from page 5-97 of the President's budget:

> The Job Corps has now been operating for 20 years. In 1985, the budget authority of $617 million would finance 40,000 training slots, at a cost of over $15,200 each. Despite the amount of time available to develop an effective program and the large cost for the program as a whole as well as per training slot, the Job Corps has not been able to meet the needs of most of those it was intended to serve. About 65% of those leaving the program each year drop out without finishing training. Only 35% of all Job Corps participants are recorded as being placed in jobs. Even though the Job Corps is intended to help those who are less job ready, this low placement rate occurs despite the fact that between 20 and 25% of those entering the Corps have completed 12 years of school. Therefore, the budget proposes to eliminate funding for the Job Corps in 1986.

Mr. President, the real facts could not be any more at variance from OMB's version of them.

The Home Builders Institute, which constitutes a major component of the private sector's very substantial involvement in and support for the Job Corps Program, has prepared a point-by-point rebuttal to the statements in the President's budget. I am most grateful to the Institute for putting together such a meticulous document, and I believe that if my colleagues will take the time to read it carefully they will immediately see how the facts have been distorted to justify an unjustifiable proposal. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this rebuttal be printed at this point in the RECORD so that my colleagues may review it in detail.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"TERMINATE THE JOB CORPS"

A REBUTTAL

(Prepared by the Home Builders Institute)

On February 4, 1985 in the Background on Major Spending Reforms and Reductions in the FY 1986 Budget the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) distributed misleading and inaccurate information about Job Corps to the United States Congress. This was their budget justification for the proposed elimination of Job Corps in Fiscal Year 1986. In an effort to set the record straight, here are the facts:

OMB says: "In FY 1985, each one of the Job Corps 40,500 slots will cost the taxpayer $15,000. This cost:

Nearly equals the annual cost of sending a student to Harvard or Stanford University which is far beyond the reach of most American families.

Is more than three times the annual cost of education at the average year public university."

The facts are:

In FY 1984 98,809 youth participated in Job Corps. This represents a cost of $6,244 per participant. "Slot costs" represent the cost of one year's training which serves more than one participant.

While comparison with university education is not relevant, nevertheless, it should be noted that the $6,244 cost per Job Corps participant buys remedial education, vocational training, room and board, transportation, clothing, medical care, counseling, and recreational programs, as well as facilities construction and rehabilitation.

Statistically, 4 out of 10 new enrollees in Job Corps have prior arrest records. Costs to incarcerate an individual range from $22,000 to $30,000 per year.

OMB says: "Job Corps high cost is not justified by program effectiveness; despite the provision of higher cash allowances for Job Corps members who continue in the program, most members do not remain onboard long enough to complete coursework."

The facts are:

The Job Corps' $40-$100/month allowances have been unchanged since 1978. These allowances are for personal necessities such as toothpaste, female hygiene needs, soap, telephone calls, snacks and soft drinks, etc. Average allowance is $14/week, not a high cost item.

Furthermore, the chance to earn higher allowances is but one very small motivational factor for a corpsmember.

OMB says: "65 percent of all Job Corps terminees do not complete a course of study before leaving."

The facts are:

This statistic is based on an internal Job Corps reporting category of top level program completion. This calls for a corpsmember to achieve the highest skill level in a particular occupation; the optimal level of achievement, but a level not realistic for every corpsmember.

Job Corps vocational curricula are competency based and provide for training in increasingly sophisticated skill levels, e.g., in the clerical occupation, ranging from file clerk through secretary stenographer. There are numerous "step off" occupational choices.

While 35 percent achieve the highest skill level, others leave the program after achieving intermediate skill levels, e.g., clerk typist, to seek work at that level. This, of course, does not mean that these corpsmembers exit as failures without marketable skills.

OMB says: "Almost half of all terminees go AWOL or voluntary resign; of these about 30 percent leave within one month of entering."

The facts are:

Termination statistics for FY 1984 show that, of all terminees:

11.4 percent leave within the first 30 days.

16.4 percent leave between 30 and 90 days.

The average length of stay is 8.2 months.

Early dropouts (e.g., within the first 30 or 90 days) often leave because they cannot adjust to the strict disciplinary systems and rigorous academic and behavior requirements imposed. This has the effect of providing available slots to those who can and will benefit from the intensive training provided.

OMB says: "Only one-third of Job Corps terminees are reported as being employed within the year after they leave Job Corps."

The facts are:

Employment Services and other placement agencies attempt to contact terminees within 6 months (not one year) after termination.

Since a substantial number of terminees do not return to their home communities, often in search of improved job opportunities elsewhere, ES agencies are often unable to locate these terminees.

The OMB statistic of a 35 percent rate is the result of dividing the number located and employed by all terminees, including those who have not been contacted, and assumes that none of the unreported individuals obtained employment. This borders on false and misleading advertisement.

The OMB statistic also carefully disregards placements in further education (community colleges, vocational schools, etc.), a valid and desirable outcome for the Job Corps youth population.

Actual known statistics are as follows:

	Year-to-date (6 months) program year 1984 July to Dec. 1984	Fiscal year 1984 Oct. 1983 to Sept. 1984
Total terminations	29,437	58,834
Terminees contacted/reported	22,736	34,096
Reported placement outcomes:
Terminees entering employment	15,317	20,655
As a percentage of terminees contacts	67.4	60.6
Terminees in further education	2,726	5,134
As a percentage of terminees contacted	12.0	15.1
Total positive outcomes	18,043	25,789
As a percentage of terminees contacted	79.4	75.6

Furthermore, comprehensive follow-up conducted on a statistically valid sample of terminees indicates no systematic pattern of difference between those contacted and reported and those not located by ES agencies.

OMB says: "Job Corps job placement is only marginally better than that of the CETA Public Service Employment program. CETA was a generally recognized failure and was terminated with bipartisan support."

The facts are:

As indicated above, the placement rate quoted by OMB is, at best, misleading and not meaningful.

Job Corps is an intensive education and skills training program for disadvantaged youth with no subsidized jobs involved; CETA Public Service Employment provided subsidized employment for an entirely different population. Any comparisons are far fetched and inappropriate.

Job Corps has been a recognized success and has earned, broad bipartisan support. It is the only employment and training program where graduates have the pride to form an alumni association to help others in need.

OMB says:

"Reports of 85-90 percent positive termination rates and statistical studies purporting to demonstrate cost effectiveness of Job Corps border on false and misleading advertisement

"85-90 percent positive termination rate is greatly overstated.

"Reported rate counts only those terminees who were 'counseled and placed' or 'not placed' and ignores the 31 percent of terminees who were not interested enough in a job to seek counseling, were subsequently jailed, or could not be located by surveyors."

The facts are:

Through 1982, the Employment and Training Reports of the President and Secretary of Labor have reported that approximately 85 percent of terminees available for placement were placed in jobs, the military or further education. The practice of eliminating those not available for placement (e.g., full-time family responsibilities) was discontinued.

As indicated above, current statistics, which count all terminees contacted, indicate that 79 percent are being placed in jobs or education.

With regard to corpsmembers "not interested enough in a job to seek counseling" from the Employment Service, Job Corps trains corpsmembers in job search techniques and encourages selfplacements efforts. These terminees are not "ignored".

The assertion regarding corpsmembers being "subsequently jailed" is contrary to all study findings and available evidence; it is not worthy of comment.

OMB says: "Reported rate includes as a positive termination anyone who subsequently reported being employed in school, or in the Armed Forces regardless of whether Job Corps had any effect on their positive outcome. Clearly some terminees would have found jobs, reenrolled in school, or entered military service without the aid of the Job Corps."

The facts are: All training programs report the success of their participants upon termination. The question of whether participants would have succeeded on their own is properly the subject of an evaluation study to determine the net impact of a program. The 1982 study by a well respected, independent research organization of Job Corps clearly concludes that the Job Corps program did, in fact, have a positive impact on its trainees and that a carefully-drawn comparison group did not fare as well.

OMB Says:

"The most recent statistical study ackowledges the softness of its findings by noting that for Job Corps be considered economically efficient it is necessary to assure that:

Job Corps training does not displace others in the job market, and Reductions in crime while participants are in the program must be counted."

That facts are:

The 1982 study referred to was conducted by Mathematica Policy Research, Inc., an independent, well respected research organization. Researchers followed up on Job Corps terminees for four years and compared their experiences with a carefully drawn comparison group to assess whether Job Corps members fared better and if the cost justified the difference.

Upon hearing the favorable results, OMB insisted that the Department of Labor engage outside experts to critique the study. These experts concluded:

The study "is on the whole reliable and represents the current state of economic and econometric art"

The study "demonstrates an exceedingly high level of competence by the evaluators and does not contain any limitations."

With regard to the OMB contention on the displacement of workers, Mathematica concluded that there is no evidence that Job Corps graduates displace workers to any great extent.

With regard to reductions in crime, Mathematica concluded that this is a worthwhile benefit since incarceration is a more expensive proposition for our society than the cost of providing education and skills in Job Corps.

Among the many impressive findings in the Mathematica Study (critically and favorably evaluated by the outside experts at the request of OMB) are:

1. Benefits vs. Costs

Job Corps benefits are greater than its costs. Measured in 1977 dollars, Job Corps produces benefits for society of approximately $7,300 per participant as against about $5,000 in costs, or about 45 percent more than the costs.

2. Stability of Gains

The overall gains experienced by corpsmembers gradually build up during the initial months out of Job Corps, and then persist fairly stably for most of the four-year post-program period.

3. Subgroup Differences

There is strong evidence that longer study in the program is associated with greater post-program gains. Completers made significantly greater gains than comparable non-participants.

OMB says:

"Other training programs, such as the Block Grant Training Program under the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA), can more effectively and more efficiently train youth for jobs.

Recent JTPA data reveal that:

JTPA cost per participant is one-third that of Job Corps'.

JTPA cost per job placement is less than one-fifth of Job Corps'."

The facts are: JTPA is designed to serve a substantially different population. Recent data shows:

[In percent]

	JTPA	Job Corps
Youth	39	100
School dropout	10	78
Minority	46	73
Combined youth/minority/dropout	7	60

The "typical" or average Job Corps enrollee is an economically disadvantaged youth, 18 years of age, minority, school dropout, reads at the 6th grade level, has never been employed full-time, comes from either a family receiving public assistance or one earning $5,389 per year, and is in need of intensive services.

One hundred percent of Job Corps enrollees receive basic education and vocational training. Only 53 percent of JTPA youth receive training in the classroom or on the job.

This is no criticism of JTPA. The comparison made by OMB is an "apple and orange" one. JOb Corps complements, not competes with JTPA. Job Corps serves severely disadvantaged youth in need of intensive services. The residential, 24-hour per day aspect of Job Corps offers the opportunity to motivate, influence and guide these youth toward a new direction to become self-sufficient, productive, tax paying citizens. This costs more. The payoff to the country has been well documented and widely recognized.

OMB says: "The relative success of JTPA is largely due to active private business sector involvement."

The facts are: OMB seems to have forgotten that Job Corps has the most direct and extensive participation by private business of any training program in the federal government: 77 of 107 Job Corps centers are operated by private companies (e.g., RCA, Singer, Teledyne, ITT) under competitive bids. The remaining 30 centers are Civilian Conservation Centers operated on public lands by the Departments of Agriculture and Interior. Moreover, vocational training on centers, leading to careers in the construction and transportation industries, have long been sponsored by the National Association of Home Builders and national labor unions. Additionally, thousands of volunteers in communities across the country help recruit, screen and provide support services to corpsmembers before they enter Job Corps, while on center and upon their departure. Job Corps, in fact, has epitomized a partnership between the federal government and the private sector for over two decades.

OMB says: "Available evidence suggests that eliminating the Job Corps and transferring responsibility to JTPA will benefit both the taxpayer and youth who are trying to overcome their disadvantages and become permanent members of the workforce."

The facts are:

Job Corps is one title of the Job Training Partnership Act. Congress recognized the need for a residential program that would take the most severely disadvantaged youth from their disruptive and culturally deprived backgrounds and immerse them in a setting of comprehensive and intensive educational, employment and support services.

Obviously, this so-called conclusion is not supported by facts or even OMB's "analysis". OMB's real intent is to isolate and attack selected programs in the guise of economic "savings". In the case of Job Corps, this was done without regard to benefit for youth or taxpayers.

Sources: All Job Corps program statistics reported under "The Facts Are . . ." come from the established Job Corps reporting systems at the U.S. Department of Labor. Post-program outcomes, including the benefit-cost analysis, are documented in "A Comparative Evaluation of the Benefits and Costs of Job Corps after Eighteen Months of Post-Program Operation," Mathematica Policy Research, Inc., 1982. Note: The Office of Management and Budget does not substantiate its findings.

Mr. CRANSTON. In addition, Mr. President, I want to bring to the Senate's attention the remarks of William Mirengoff, a former National Director of the Job Corps, at a January 10, 1985, Job Corps Policy Forum sponsored by the Home Builders Institute. Mr. Mirengoff, now in the private sector with the Bureau of Social Science Research, speaks with much authority on the Job Corps having been intimately involved with it during the 1969 attack on the program by the Nixon administration. His remarks offer not only a retrospective on its past and a summation of its present successes, but also some critical comments about its problems and needs for the future.

I hope that my colleagues will take the time to read Mr. Mirengoff's remarks. If they do, I believe they will conclude, as I have, that Mr. Mirengoff is correct when he says:

The central test to be met is: does Job Corps provide greater value to society than the value of the resources it uses. Job Corps passes [this test] with flying colors.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of Mr. Mirengoff's remarks be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOB CORPS POLICY FORUM—THE NIXON EXPERIENCE AND BEYOND

(By William Mirengoff)

I. INTRODUCTION

It's good once again, to be with friends in the Job Corps (J.C.) family. I wish the occasion was more auspicious. A few months ago, we were celebrating the 20th anniversary of JC; today we are concerned about its survival.

The Home Builders Institute, Phil Polivchak and LaVera Leonard are to be commended for organizing this timely forum.

My own enthusiasm for the J.C. flows from my conviction that it does the most for those who are most in need and that it returns to society far more than it takes. I have been intimately involved in all of the alphabetical combinations that constituted the employment and training programs over three decades and am convinced that the J.C. concept is the most valid for the population it serves. Unlike single dimensional programs, the J.C. approach is holistic. It recognizes the necessity of a multi-faceted approach in dealing with the host of problems besetting the most disadvantaged segment of our population.

I guess my role this morning is to review the trials and tribulations of the 1969 cutback on the assumption that the lamp of experience may illuminate present paths. I am pleased to do this but would also like to dwell a bit on our present situation and future directions. All, I believe, are interrelated.

II. THE NIXON PERIOD

In 1968, Richard Nixon promised to eliminate the J.C., which, at that time, was vulnerable on several counts.

1. Its public image, molded by a constant stream of horror stories, was very poor. The media blew up every fistfight into a storm of violence. J.C. centers were perceived as places where riots, vandalism, assaults and sexual behavior were out of control. Although grossly overblown, serious problems did exist. I don't know how many hours I spent over such issues as the use of mace by security guards, inter-racial conflicts (West Side Story revisited), contraception and abortion policies, Corpsmember safety, tamper-proof lockers, dormitory discipline, etc.

2. J.C. management, in my opinion, was weak both at the national level and in the centers. I have seen centers in which streetwise youth were calling the shots.

3. J.C. entry and exit was a revolving door. The length of stay was very short, resulting in high recruitment and transportation costs.

4. Job placement, the presumed objective of the program, was very low on the centers' priorities.

5. Job Corps was exploited. Too many J.C. personnel at all levels were "working JC" rather than working for J.C.

But J.C. was not eliminated in 1969. It was, however, transferred from OEO to Labor, cut by ⅓ based upon six performance criteria, and put on probation. White House principals Ehrlichman and Colson sent imperious memos to Secretary of Labor Shultz demanding to know how he was going to straighten out the J.C. mess. Here is a quote from one such memo:

"The President saw JC as an unsuccessful program which should not be perpetuated; its many troublesome and unsatisfying aspects should be totally discontinued now. What is constructive will remain, and be dovetailed into your Department."

Although J.C. was not disestablished, its ultimate demise was considered a foregone conclusion. Congressman Flood of Pennsylvania called the transfer from OEO to Labor, "the kiss of death." The National office staff was convinced that Bill Mirengoff had come, not to praise but to bury J.C. So pervasive was this belief that even a year later, as I travelled across the country, people were surprised to learn that yes, there still was a J.C.

The effects of 1969 surgery and the assumed demise of J.C. were devastating. And it is important that the results of that experience be widely understood so that the consequences of a replay of that scenario be fully appreciated.

The first effects were felt among staff. Anxieties and sinking morale almost paralyzed operations. Even in centers not affected by the cuts, staff began looking for other employment.

The enrollee recruitment machinery fell into disuse and rusted. It was difficult to maintain enrollment at full capacity at the surviving centers. As a result of underutilization, unit costs shot up and we were in trouble on that score.

Logistic and transportation problems were severe and costly.

Contract terminations, cancellation of leases, divestiture of property, maintenance of closed centers including security guards, etc. all involved huge expenditures—cost without benefits.

Most harmful was the effect on the Corpsmembers who were shuffled among centers or sent back to the inner cities, disillusioned and alienated. Many were simply lost in the process.

The cost considerations of dismantling J.C. must be underscored because it is germane to the fiscal objective of OMB. It may very well be that the costs of termination would approximate the costs of continuation, at least for the first fiscal year. It can of course be argued that the "out-years" expenditures would be reduced. This is true if we are concerned only with direct program outlays for J.C. But if we take a broader view of societal costs, if we quantified the economic and non-economic outcomes of J.C. participation, I am satisfied that the gains would far outweigh the costs.

Rigorous studies of the economic and non-economic impact of the J.C. program indicate that J.C. was successful in:

1. Increasing employment—by four weeks a year; and earnings—by $600.

2. Improving future labor market opportunities through work experience, job seeking skills, work habits, military service, better training, geographic mobility, and higher educational levels. There was a five-fold increase in the number who achieved high school degrees or equivalencies.

3. Reducing dependency on public assistance; over 38 percent of J.C. enrollees come from AFDC rolls.

4. Reducing criminality; in 1978, 38 percent of the Corpsmembers had prior arrest records. Some had been remanded to J.C. by the courts in lieu of incarceration. Ex-offenders improved in criminal behavior after J.C.

Among women Corpsmembers, for example, criminal activity had been reduced from 32 percent to four percent. This has major implications for the young people themselves and for society. Many programs refuse to admit young people with criminal records. J.C. accepts them, educates them, trains them, counsels them and reduces recidivism. Society saves money on courts, prisons and probation. Depending upon whether it's a one star or three star facility, it costs between $25,000 to $30,000 to keep a person in jail for one year; twice the J.C. cost.

In addition, J.C. had a positive impact on a number of noneconomic outcomes:

1. Job satisfaction.
2. Attitude towards authority.
3. Self esteem.
4. Health—enrollees were provided 10 times as many medical visits as they would have received outside the J.C.

In sum, objective evaluations demonstrated that J.C. is a worthwhile public investment. Social benefits exceed costs by $2,300 per enrollee. The average investment per Corpsmember is paid back in three years. Moreover, JC touches, in a positive way, each of the areas of greatest public concern—crime, taxes, welfare payments and national security (via entrance into the military).

The real issue is not the savings, but the cost of terminating J.C. Society will certainly pay a price. As the TV ad puts it, "You can pay me now or pay me later."

This is the message that must be trumpeted. If the 1960's was the decade of the idealists, the 80's is the decade of the pragmatists. The central test to be met is: does J.C. provide greater value to society than the value of the resources it uses. J.C. passes with flying colors.

III. THE PRESENT

Unlike previous years when the J.C. budget was treated as a discrete program, it is now caught up in a larger game in which the major considerations are defense expenditures, domestic expenditures, and tax policies. However that game is played out, it will be necessary to assess the strengths and problems of J.C. in making the case for continuation.

A. Strengths

First, its strengths. The J.C. has overcome most of the problems of the 1969 period.

1. Its image and performance are good. It has moved from the bottom of the array of manpower programs to the top. Success stories have replaced the horror stories of the Sixties which led many Congressmen to claim that "J.C. had failed more noticeably than any other program." Most importantly, the program is cost effective.

2. The positive outcome rate for Corpsmembers is high—75 percent.

3. The value of goods produced by Corpsmembers is significant.

4. The concept of youth conservation programs is perceived as part of the American tradition. Every public opinion poll shows overwhelming support for the civilian conservation concept. Congressman Williams reminded me that practically everyone had a family member, relative or friend in the old CCC camps. Moreover, most of what had been done in the program is still in evidence.

5. The management of J.C. at the national and center levels has improved considerably.

6. J.C. assigns to the private sector the responsibility of operating most of its centers. Nixon had pledged greater involvement of private industry to solve America's social problems. The present Administration views private sector initiatives as the centerpiece of its employment and training programs. Witness, for example, the Private Industry Councils (PIC) in JTPA. Thus, it seems passing strange that the program which most fully embraces the Administration's philosophy should be considered for extinction.

7. The constituency of JC is legion. It includes:

a. The private sector as represented by the J.C. contractors. This leverage could be extended through such influential organizations as the Business Roundtable, Chambers of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers.

b. The trade unions; not only those participating in center training programs, but also the national AFL–CIO.

c. In most of 107 communities, J.C. has become an integral part of the local economic fabric. Its jobs are filled by local residents and the centers make their purchase within the community. The termination of these centers would threaten the well being of innumerable people and localities.

d. In addition to those who are parties at interest, there are numerous disinterested organizations committed to the support of youth and conservation programs.

e. Most important, of course, are the members of Congress—and not only those with centers in their districts. Unlike 1969 when J.C. had become a divisive party issue, it now enjoys strong bi-partisan support. Witness the budget actions in the last session of Congress.

In my opinion, it was the efforts of business, labor, local communities, a handful of determined Congressmen such as Carl Perkins, and the unflappable perseverance of Secretary Shultz that saw J.C. through its crisis in 1969.

B. Problems

On the other side of the ledger are a number of serious problems that will have to be faced.

1. First, there is the overriding concern over the size of the deficit, that could overshadow all other considerations.

2. There is also a remote possibility of a recision of some 1985 funds and perhaps a reconciliation bill. This would lump appropriation reductions in a single package and force an up or down vote on the entire package. It would also affect authorization provisions.

3. The fate of J.C. could be affected by the approach taken to accomplish budget reductions—across-the-board cuts, line item cuts, a budget freeze or some combination. The freeze seems to be gathering support. It has an aura of "fairness" and avoids forcing Congressmen to choose among competing programs. There is also support for exempting programs for the poor, which should include JC. However, if selected cuts are added to a freeze, JC could be in trouble. These matters will be discussed at greater length and more authoritatively in the afternoon session. In any event, there is a pressing need to be sure that the J.C. programs and their accomplishments are fully understood.

4. J.C. unit costs have been a bugaboo since the inception of J.C. and continue to be a sore point with OMB.

5. There is always the danger of fragmenting program support by salami slicing—lopping off parts of a program with the expectation that the sacrifice would be acceptable to the survivors. Benjamin Franklin offered some sound advise on this score.

6. Finally, there is the problem of parentage. Current programs cannot retroactively choose their parents any more than you or I. Frequently, the sins of the parents are visited upon their children. A review of the programs proposed for elimination indicate that most are the progeny of previous administrations. J.C., a Great Society survivor, unfortunately does not have the imprimature of this administration.

IV. THE FUTURE

In conclusion, a word about the future. I understand of course that if we don't get past the present, there is no future. But I am an optimist and I believe that our reach must exceed our grasp. We must look beyond the present and turn the face of J.C. towards the future, formulating new ideas and adapting J.C. to the needs of an evolving society.

We came out of the 1969 episode with a more viable program because we did not try to explain away the problems that plagued J.C. We acknowledged them and set to work to overcome them. We took a fresh look at the assumptions upon which J.C. was based. We accepted some as valid, rejected others and struck out in new directions. This was the essential tool that Secretary Schultz used to protect the basic program.

The separate men and women Job Corps were consolidated followed by coed centers. Input into centers was regionalized. Contract practices were tightened. Job placement was emphasized. Greater use was made of trade union programs. Large centers, which had become unmanageable, were reduced in size, and experiments with new in-city centers were conducted.

Where do we go from here? I suggest that we look upon our present situation as not only a challenge that must be met but also as an opportunity to reexamine what we have been doing; to seek innovations that will strengthen the program and build new constituencies. It is because I believe in the fundamental validity of the J.C. concept and its adaptability that I have confidence in the present and future of J.C.

To those of you who lived through the 1969 experience, this may seem like the second episode of the Perils of Pauline. But remember, in the end, Pauline always was saved.

Mr. CRANSTON. Finally, Mr. President, I want to note a recent editorial from the Washington Post of February 9, 1985, entitled "Save the Job Corps," which cites the Job Corps as being "one of the few programs that has ever succeeded in realistic measure in dealing with the Nation's hardest-to-employ youth." It goes on to say that "controlled comparisons"—such as the one prepared in rebuttal by the Home Builders Institute which I have just inserted into the RECORD—show that the Job Corps is a good investment for the taxpayer. Most importantly, from the perspective of what this program is all about, the editorial concludes that even controlled calculations don't take account of the moral returns to a country that reaches out to its most disadvantaged young people.

I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I want to take this opportunity to urge all Senators to join with me in supporting the continuation of this vitally important and most valuable contribution to addressing a critical national problem: The needs of our neediest young people. We cannot let this proven program and all the youths it can help be cast aside and cut adrift.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAVE THE JOB CORPS

One of the last survivors of the War on Poverty is slated for extinction. The president's budget for fiscal 1986 and beyond would close down the Job Corps, one of the few programs that has ever succeeded in realistic measure in dealing with the nation's hardest-to-employ youth.

Like most social experiments of the 1960s, the Job Corps was conceived with an excess of expectation and a deficit of common sense. Unlike most social experiments, the Job Corps was allowed to survive long enough to learn from its mistakes. When Richard Nixon proposed ending the Job Corps, management was poor, discipline was lax and some sites suffered from racial discord and vandalism. As William Mirengoff, who took over the program for the Nixon administration recalls, "The media blew up every fist-fight into a storm of violence."

Job Corps' administrators recruited counselors who knew how to deal with street kids, tightened up standards for counselors and youths and got unions and businesses to update training courses. A few years later, careful studies showed the Job Corps scoring impressive successes in changing the lives of kids otherwise headed for disaster—those with arrest records, out-of-wedlock pregnancy and truancy, for example, in their backgrounds.

The Jobs Corps is a residential program. It takes youths out of ghettos and depressed rural areas and moves them to camps to do conservation work and training. The hope is that the change of atmosphere and routine will make it easier for them to shake off the bad habits. That makes the program expensive—$15,000 for a year-round slot. It also means that the initial dropout rate is high, since many can't make the adjustment. But it also accounts for the program's notable success in increasing employment, military enlistment and further education, and reducing criminality and welfare dependency among those who stick it out.

In making its case for disbanding the program, the Office of Management and Budget focuses only on the high cost per slot—ignoring the fact that more than one youth can fill a slot during a year—and the relatively low rate of direct placement in jobs—ignoring other positive outcomes such as military enlistment or return to school or the fact that, as in most training programs, large numbers of graduates find jobs for themselves. But controlled comparisons (which don't make all these obvious mistakes) show that the Job Corps is a good investment for the taxpayer. And even those calculations don't take account of the moral returns to a country that reaches out to its most disadvantaged young people.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE ADJOURNMENT

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985, the Secretary of the Senate, on February 8, February 11, and February 12, 1985, during the adjournment of the Senate, received messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations and a treaty; which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received on February 8, February 11, and February 12, 1985, are printed in today's RECORD at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE U.S. ARMS CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT AGENCY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE ADJOURNMENT—PM 19

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985, the Secretary of the Senate, on February 11, 1985, during the adjournment of the Senate, received the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

The security of our people, the primary responsibility of the Federal government, is accomplished through the complementary objectives of a strong defense capability and unambigous and credible arms control agreements. While we have made substantial progress in rebuilding our defenses during the past four years, progress in arms control has not kept pace.

It is my intention in the next four years to do everything possible to find practical arrangements with the Soviet Union that will sharply reduce nuclear weapons. Arms control negotiations are surely the best way for pursuing such important objectives, and thus, I view with the utmost seriousness the negotiating commitments made with the Soviet Union four weeks ago in Geneva. We are now prepared to address not only nuclear offensive systems, but also strategic defenses and the essential improvements in verification.

In addition to these new bilateral arms control efforts, a number of multilateral activities play significant roles in our comprehensive arms control program. For example, discussions are being directed to banning chemical weapons and to reaching agreement on measures that will build confidence in understanding the activities and intentions of adversaries. This 24th Annual Report of the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency describes these and all the many facets of the Administration's 1984 program. I am pleased to forward it to the Congress.

U.S. GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENT AND AGENCY ACTIVITY TOWARD PREVENTING NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE ADJOURNMENT—PM 20

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985, the Secretary of the Senate, on February 12, 1985, during the adjournment of the Senate, received the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I have reviewed the activities of United States Government departments and agencies during the calendar year 1984 related to preventing nuclear proliferation, and I am pleased to submit my annual report on this subject pursuant to section 601(a) of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 (Public Law 95-242).

The Report concludes that the United States during 1984 continued to make important progress in its efforts to achieve its non-proliferation goals.

It is my firm conviction that preventing the spread of nuclear explosives to additional countries is essential to world peace and stability. It forms an indispensable complement to the efforts we have undertaken to bring about deep reductions in strategic and intermediate-range nuclear weapons. It is no exaggeration to say that the future of mankind may well depend on the achievement of these goals, and I intend to pursue them with unflagging determination and a deep sense of personal commitment.

ASSISTANCE TO SUB-SAHARAN AFRICA

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, by request, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill amending the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to authorize the President to furnish assistance to sub-Saharan Africa.

This proposed legislation has been requested by the Agency for International Development and I am introducing it in order that there may be a specific bill to which Members of the Senate and the public may direct their attention and comments.

I reserve my right to support or oppose this bill, as well as any suggested amendments to it, when the matter is considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point, together with a section-by-section analysis of the bill and the letter from the Administrator of the Agency for International Development to the President of the Senate dated February 5, 1985.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

INTERNATIONAL DISASTER ASSISTANCE

Chapter 9 of part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 495K. AFRICA RELIEF, REHABILITATION, AND RECONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE.—(a) The Congress recognizes that the food crisis in sub-Saharan Africa, the effects of which are magnified by acute health problems, is unprecedented in its magnitude and the misery it has caused the peoples in that region. Accordingly, the President is authorized to furnish assistance, on such terms and conditions as he may determine, for relief, rehabilitation, and reconstruction activities to alleviate the impact and immediate causes of the food and health crisis in sub-Saharan Africa. Such activities may include (1) the provision of food, medicine, medical care, transportation, training, equipment, or other assistance necessary for the effective utilization of assistance provided by the United States or other donors; and (2) assistance to address longer term rehabilitation and reconstruction needs.

"(b) There are authorized to be appropriated to the President for the purposes of this section, in addition to amounts otherwise available for such purposes, $25,000,000 for the fiscal year 1985. Amounts appropriated under this section are authorized to remain available until expended.

"(c) Assistance under this section shall be provided in accordance with the policies and general authorities contained in section 491.".

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS—INTERNATIONAL DISASTER ASSISTANCE

This section amends the International Disaster Assistance chapter of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to authorize the appropriation of $25,000,000 to assist in meeting the emergency relief, rehabilitation, and reconstruction needs of those affected by the food crisis in Africa. The section authorizes the use of these funds for such activities as the provision of food, medicines transportation, and other assistance to address longer term rehabilitation and reconstruction needs.

AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT,
Washington, DC, February 5, 1985.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the Senate, Washington, DC

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I herewith transmit, on behalf of the President, a bill to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to authorize the appropriation of supplemental disaster assistance for those suffering from the severe food crisis in sub-Saharan Africa.

America's response to the continuing food emergency in Africa has been massive, and the United States has been in the forefront of donor countries providing food, medicines and other help to those in need in Africa. The generous response of millions of Americans to the plight of those affected by drought, famine, and disease in Africa has been particularly gratifying.

The authorization of the additional $25 million requested by the bill I am transmitting today is an important part of a total supplemental request of $235 million for emergency food and non-food assistance. Enactment of legislation authorizing additional disaster assistance funds, and the appropriation of the Administration's request for supplemental assistance, will enable the United States to continue to provide help to the people of Africa affected by the drought and food shortages. I ask your urgent consideration of this legislation.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection to the presentation of this draft proposal and that its enactment would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

M. PETER MCPHERSON.●

By Mr. EXON (for himself, Mr. BOREN, Mr. SIMON, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. LEVIN, and Mr. ZORINSKY):

S. 458. A bill to provide emergency credit and debt adjustment relief to financially stressed farmers and ranchers; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

FARM EMERGENCY CREDIT ACT

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today which will effectively deal with the farm debt crisis currently facing our family farmers and ranchers throughout America. This legislation is truly an emergency measure designed to save family agriculture until necessary fundamental reforms can be adopted to restore economic health to our valuable agriculture sector.

This legislation is the product of a bipartisan group of Members of Congress from rural areas of this country who reject the administration claim that the farm debt crisis has been caused solely by the farmers.

Mr. President, it is time to take off the rose colored glasses and see the reality of the causes behind the current depression in agriculture. The facts of the matter are simple. The Federal Government's policies of high deficits, high interest rates, the overvalued dollar abroad, and sharply declining land values have pushed farmers into a corner and now the Government must provide the relief required to put them on sound financial footing once again.

Mr. President, this bill I am introducing provides for the following:

First. Advance Commodity Credit Corporation loans to producers of 1985 crops;

Second. A debt restructuring mechanism at a low interest rate of 2½ percent above the Federal Reserve's discount rate;

Third. A 90-percent Government guarantee on loans provided through the farm credit system and commercial lenders;

Fourth. An emergency transfer of personnel from agencies of the Department of Agriculture to the Farmers Home Administration.

Mr. President, this legislation will give our family farmers the necessary short-term assistance to get them through this next 45-day period. It will also give the Congress some breathing room to begin its work on an adequate long-term solution which will hopefully put agriculture on the road to recovery and negate the need for this kind of emergency legislation in the future.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a more detailed summary of this legislation as well as the text of the bill be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 458

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Farm Emergency Credit Act of 1985".

ADVANCE RECOURSE COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION LOANS

SEC. 2. Effective for the 1985 crops, the Agricultural Act of 1949 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section 424 as follows:

"SEC. 424. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Secretary shall make advance recourse loans available to producers of each of the commodities of the 1985 crop for which nonrecourse loans are made available under this Act, as follows:

"(1) Advance recourse loans shall be available (A) to producers of commodities for which a production adjustment program is in effect who agree to participate in the program announced for the commodity, at the applicable nonrecourse loan rate for the commodity involved, on an amount of the commodity equal to 50 per centum of (i) the Farm Program yield for the commodity times the farm program acreage for the commodity, or (ii) the farm marketing quota for the commodity, as determined by the Secretary, and (B) to producers of other commodities at the applicable nonrecourse loan rate for the commodity involved on an amount of the commodity equal to 50 per centum of the farm yield for the commodity times the farm acreage for the commodity, as determined by the Secretary.

"(2) When the producers on a farm harvest the commodity involved, they may convert the loan to a nonrecourse loan, as otherwise provided for in this Act, by providing the amount of the commodity of the grade and quality represented by the loan as security for the loan.

"(3) The proceeds of advance recourse loans shall be made available as needed solely to cover expenses incurred in the production of the crop.

"(4) Advance recourse loans shall be made available only to producers who agree to comply with terms and conditions determined appropriate by the Secretary consistent with the provisions of this section.

"(b) The Secretary shall carry out the program provided for under this section through the Commodity Credit Corporation, using the services of the county committees established under section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act to the extent appropriate.

"(c) The provisions of this section shall take effect, and advance loans under this section shall be made available, fifteen days after the date of enactment of the Farm Emergency Credit Act of 1985.".

FARM DEBT RESTRUCTURING

SEC. 3. The Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act is amended by—

(1) adding at the end thereof a new section 349 as follows:

"IMPLEMENTATION OF THE DEBT ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM AND THE PROGRAM FOR SPECIAL SET-ASIDES OF FARMER PROGRAM INDEBTEDNESS

"SEC. 349. Notwithstanding any other provision of law—

"(a) In implementing the debt adjustment program established under section 339 of this title on October 19, 1984, the Secretary—

"(1) shall permit lenders to qualify for a loan guarantee under the program by making the loan available to the borrower at an annual interest charge not in excess of the rate on short-term adjustment and seasonal credit provided by the Federal Reserve banks to financial institutions at the time the application for the loan guarantee is made plus 2.5 percentage points, in lieu of writing off a portion of the existing debt being adjusted under the program;

"(2) shall provide that, for the purposes of the program, a cash flow that reflects a balance available of 100 per centum of the amount needed to pay all the year's debt due including anticipated tax liability will be considered a positive cash-flow; and

"(3) shall make guarantees available for 90 per centum of a loan for an amount not in excess of the outstanding principal and interest owed on the existing debt being adjusted under the program.

"(b) In implementing the program for special set-asides of a portion of the indebtedness under Farmers Home Administration farmer program loans established under section 339 of this title on October 19, 1984, the Secretary shall provide that, for the purposes of the program, if a farm and home plan for the typical year shows a balance available of 100 per centum of the amount needed to pay all the year's debts due including tax liability, the borrower will be considered to have a positive cash flow projection.

"(c) The provisions of this section shall take effect fifteen days after the date of enactment of the Farm Emergency Credit Act of 1985."; and

(2) adding at the end of section 346 a new subsection (f) as follows:

"(f) In addition to any amounts heretofore authorized by law for loan guarantees under this Act in fiscal year 1985, there are hereby authorized to be guaranteed under the Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund $2,350,000,000 in farm ownership loans and operating loans in fiscal year 1985.".

LOAN SERVICING RESOURCES

SEC. 4. (a)(1) Congress finds that—

(A) persistently low farm income (due in part to weak export demand), high interest rates, and declining farmland values have created severe financial stress for many farmers;

(B) many financially stressed farmers have turned to the Farmers Home Administration for assistance (including insured loans, loan guarantees, deferral of loan payments, and restructuring of debt) in coping with their credit-related problems; and

(C) it is essential for the national welfare that farmers' requests to the Farmers Home Administration for assistance be processed as expeditiously as possible, especially in light of the need of many farmers to resolve their credit problems in a timely manner to be able to plant and cultivate the 1985 crops.

(2) It is the sense of Congress that the Secretary of Agriculture should immediately take steps, using authorities of law provided to the Secretary, to make personnel and other resources of the Department of Agriculture available to the Farmers Home Administration sufficient to enable the Farmers Home Administration to process applications from farmers for assistance expeditiously and in a timely manner with respect to farm operations relating to the planting and cultivation of the 1985 crops.

(b) Subsection (h) of section 309 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act is amended by—

(1) designating the existing text thereof as paragraph (1); and

(2) inserting at the end thereof a new paragraph (2) as follows:

"(2) In implementing the approved lender program established under section 339 of this Act on May 4, 1984, the Secretary shall ensure that each request of a lending institution for designation as an approved lender under the program be reviewed, and a decision made on the application, within fifteen days after the lending institution has submitted a completed application to the Farmers Home Administration. The provisions of this paragraph shall become effective fifteen days after the date of enactment of the Farm Emergency Credit Act of 1985.".

REGULATIONS

SEC. 5. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Agriculture shall issue or amend regulations to implement the provisions of this Act as soon as practicable but not later than fifteen days after the date of enactment of this Act.

SUMMARY OF FARM EMERGENCY CREDIT ACT OF 1985

SECTION 1.—ADVANCE COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION LOANS

Advance price support loans will be made available to producers of 1985 crops. These loans will be made available to producers who participate in the 1985 farm program, with a maximum of 50 percent of the producer's 1985 crop eligible for advance CCC price support loans.

Eligible crops shall include those crops for which price support loans are available as specified in the 1949 Food and Agriculture Act.

These loans shall be recourse loans as long as the crop remains unharvested. Upon harvest, and certification that the crop is available as collateral for the loan, the status shall change to non-recourse.

The interest rate on the advance support loans would be set at normal CCC interest rate levels.

The advance loan program would be administered by the ASCS and ASC county committees.

SECTION 2.—DEBT RESTRUCTURING

The current administration loan guarantee (debt adjustment) program would be revised as follows:

A 90 percent guarantee will be available on loans provided through the farm credit system and commercial lenders.

The FmHA's cash flow requirement would be reduced from 110 percent to 100 percent. (This would apply to the FmHA debt set-aside program, as well as new loans.)

A lender would be required to establish interest rates on the loan at a level of not more than 2½ points above the Federal Reserve's discount rate.

A program would be available for debt restructuring as well as current operating expenses.

SECTION 3.—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

USDA will be instructed to use all possible avenues available to the Department to facilitate the administration of this program.

Loan guarantee authority will be increased to $3 billion.

Legislation requires the USDA to have both the advance price support program, and the debt restructuring program available within 15 days of enactment of the legislation.

Within 30 days of application, FmHA must approve or reject the lending institutions' application for participation in the "approved lender" program, in order for the institution to provide immediate credit assistance.

By Mr. HART:

S. 459. A bill to provide emergency assistance to farmers, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

1985 EMERGENCY FARM CREDIT RELIEF ACT

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, today I am introducing the 1985 Emergency Farm Credit Relief Act, legislation to provide immediate credit relief to thousands of financially strapped farmers across the country. Once enacted, this bill will provide the means necessary to enable farmers in Colorado and around the Nation to begin their spring planting.

We are all well aware of the financial crisis which has gripped the Nation's farm belt in recent months. Farmers in nearly every State continue to experience deteriorating financial circumstances because of persistent high interest rates, stagnant farm prices, rising production costs, and an erosion of the value of farm equity. Without dramatic action during the next 90 days to restore confidence in the financial viability of agriculture, many farmers will be unable to secure the crop and livestock financing necessary for the upcoming crop year.

The legislation I am introducing today has three principal emergency components. First, it makes available advance commodity loans to farmers for one-half their anticipated crop, based on historic yield. In short, it provides farmers the cash necessary to plant—before they plant, not when they harvest. Second, this legislation expands the Farmers Home Administration [FmHA] operating loan guarantee program to $3 billion from the currently authorized $650 million level. And finally, the bill permits farm lenders to qualify for the loan guarantee program by writing down interest rates to a level not exceeding the so-called discount rate plus 2.5 percent. By eliminating the "forgiveness" feature, this provision will encourage greater numbers of farm lenders to participate in the previous announced farm debt restructuring program by enabling them to write down interest rates in exchange for loan guarantees instead of taking a loss on 10 percent of any given agricultural loan.

Mr. President, I would like to make several important points about this legislation. For the first time this bill includes a mechanism to target Federal assistance toward small- and medium-sized producers—those experiencing the most acute financial stress in the farm economy. By incorporating a graduated or tiered loan rate, this legislation can provide the emergency relief necessary to sustain many of our best farmers another year and, at the same time, prevent unlimited access to this important program by the Nation's largest farms and corporate producers.

By phasing down the loan rate as volume increases, the Federal Government can begin to establish limits on the volume of wheat and corn eligible for CCC loans, thereby helping to create a disincentive to unlimited production. Moreover, by establishing this important mechanism in law, we can begin to target our limited Federal financial assistance toward the small- and medium-sized, independent and family farm operators—those identified by the Department of Agriculture as the most efficient producers of food and fiber.

By providing advance CCC loans for one-half their anticipated crop, we can help the Nation's farmers weather these uncertain and chaotic economic circumstances. We can provide the bridge across rough financial waters, enabling thousands of farmers in my own State and others to survive until the farm economy improves, and a sound and equitable farm bill is enacted.

Perhaps most important, we can provide much of this assistance at virtually no cost to the Treasury. Although there are risks associated with the advance outlay of CCC loans, the potential costs of this risk pale by comparison to the costs which will accompany the collapse of an important and efficient segment of our farm economy. Should the latter occur, the costs of welfare, unemployment, and other Federal safety-net programs for farmers can be expected to cost millions and millions of dollars. In contrast, the emergency steps authorized by this legislation will have little impact on the budget now and no impact once the harvest is completed next fall.

Finally, this legislation authorizes expansion of the FmHA Operating Loan Guarantee Program to permit a larger number of farmers to reschedule their debt, and to encourage more agricultural lending institutions to participate in the program. Since its inception during the 1970's, the loan guarantee program has incurred an average historical loss rate of 4.7 percent. Both the popularity of this program and its low loss rate make it a particularly attractive tool to alleviate financial stress in agriculture. I cannot overemphasize the importance of expanding this program and making it more attractive to farm lenders. This emergency effort can help us reach many more farmers around the country who need desperately to reschedule and secure additional crop and livestock financing for the coming crop year.

Mr. President, this legislation will provide additional help to many of the Nation's hard-pressed farmers. This is a short-term emergency proposal to address what appears to be a short-term emergency situation in America's heartland. It is not put forward as a cure-all for what ails the farm economy—this will require substantial efforts to address problems in the general economy and enactment of a new farm program framework. But without dramatic action during the next 60 days many of our most efficient farmers' livelihoods will be cut short, undermining the economies of many small towns in Colorado and other States.

Nothing we do today can substitute for measureable progress on the deficit, a restoration of funds for important rural development and agricultural programs, and passage of a sound and equitable farm bill which helps restore stability and prosperity to the farm economy.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to promptly consider and pass this and other legislation providing emergency assistance for farmers. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 459

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "1985 Emergency Farm Credit Relief Act".

"SEC. 107D. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Secretary shall make available advance recourse loans to producers who agree to participate in the wheat or feed grain program authorized by section 107B or section 105B of this Act, respectively, for the 1985 crop of such commodities and who agree to comply with such other terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe consistent with the provisions of this section.

"(b)(1) Advance recourse loans under subsection (a) shall be made to the producer at the levels described in paragraph (2) of this subsection. Such loans shall be made on an amount of the commodity determined by multiplying (i) 50 per centum of the farm program payment yield established for farm for the crop, by (ii) the estimated farm program acreage for the crop, as determined by the Secretary.

"(2)(A) Advance recourse loans for wheat shall be made available on the amount determined under the second sentence of paragraph (1) of this subsection at the following levels:

"(i) $3.80 per bushel for any portion of the amount so determined that does not exceed 10,000 bushels;

"(ii) $3.55 per bushel of any portion of the amount so determined that is more than 10,000 bushels but does not exceed 20,000 bushels;

"(C) Advance recourse loans for grain sorghums, barley, oats, and rye shall be made available on the amount determined under second sentence of paragraph (1) of this subsection at such levels that the Secretary determines are fair and reasonable in relation to the levels that advance recourse loans are made available for comparable quantities of corn.

"(3) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection, an advance recourse loan made to a producer under subsection (a) shall be limited to an amount that the Secretary determines necessary to produce the commodity.

"(4) Unless an advance recourse loan made under subsection (a) has been repaid by the producer, the loan shall be converted to a nonrecourse loan authorized by section 107B(a) or 105B(a) of this Act to the extent that the producer meets the requirement of such a nonrecourse loan. The conversion shall be made as soon as practicable after the crop is harvested.

"(5) Except as provide in paragraph (6) of this subsection, an advance loan made under subsection (a) shall become due at the end of the marketing year for the crop unless such loan has been converted to a nonrecourse loan under paragraph (4) of this subsection.

"(7) The Secretary may issue such regulations as the Secretary determines necessary to carry out this section.

"(8) The Secretary shall carry out the program authorized by this section through the Commodity Credit Corporation.

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, the bill I am introducing will provide the Farm Credit Administration with many of the same enforcement powers currently held by other financial institution regulatory agencies.

This legislation is needed to ensure greater protection of the borrowers and investors of the Farm Credit System.

The Farm Credit System is the largest provider of agricultural credit in the world. The System has about 1 million loans outstanding and a loan portfolio in excess of $80 billion.

Because Farm Credit System lenders make loans almost exclusively for agricultural purposes, they have been hard hit by the depression that plagues the agricultural economy. In recent months, System lenders have experienced record losses. The hundreds of millions of dollars in losses have forced numerous production credit associations to liquidate their loan portfolios or merge with other PCA's.

When a PCA is forced to liquidate its loan portfolio, the member-owners of the PCA often lose part or all of their investment in the cooperative. This has happened in my State of Nebraska and in several other States. In addition, because System lenders are cooperative in nature, the losses experienced by one association or region are shared with the other lenders of the System. This results in higher interest rates for all Farm Credit System borrowers.

There is no question that the primary cause of the Farm Credit System's financial problems is the depressed farm economy. However, I have raised the issue of what steps the regulator of the Farm Credit System—the Farm Credit Administration—can take to provide for the maximum protection of borrowers and investors.

Under current law and despite its tremendous responsibility, the Farm Credit Administration has very limited authorities which can be used to intervene to protect the interests of the System or its borrowers and investors. The legislation I am introducing will provide the additional authorities needed to ensure sound banking practices while establishing the formal procedures that will guarantee the management rights of the System's directors and officers.

Specifically, the bill authorizes the Farm Credit Administration to issue cease and desist orders, establish a formal procedure for the removal of System directors or officers, establish a formal procedure for assessing civil money penalties for violations of certain orders or regulations, to apply directly to Federal courts for enforcement of orders and civil penalties, and to require the merger of like System institutions.

The Farm Credit Administration, at my request, assisted in drafting this legislation. It is my understanding that since the Farm Credit Administration responded to my request, the Federal Farm Credit Board has decided to endorse this type of legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation, a section-by-section analysis of the legislation, and the text of the letter from Governor Wilkinson transmitting the draft legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 466

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Farm Credit Administration Improvement Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Title IV of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new part as follows:

"PART F—ENFORCEMENT ACTIONS AND PENALTIES

"SEC. 4.30. CEASE AND DESIST PROCEEDINGS.—(a)(1) The Farm Credit Administration shall issue and serve a notice of charges upon an institution of the Farm Credit System, or any other person participating in the conduct of the affairs of the institution, if the Farm Credit Administration has reasonable cause to believe that the institution or the person (1) is engaging in, has engaged in, or is about to engage in, an unsafe or unsound practice in conducting the business of the institution; or (2) is violating, has violated, or is about to violate, a law, rule, or regulation, or any condition imposed in writing by the Farm Credit Administration in connection with the Farm Credit Administration's supervision of the institution or any written agreement entered into with the Farm Credit Administration.

"(2) A notice issued and served under paragraph (1) shall contain a statement of the facts constituting the basis for the charges made therein against the institution or person. The notice shall fix a time and place for a hearing on the charges to determine whether an order to cease and desist from the violation or unsafe or unsound practice should be issued against the institution or person. The hearing shall be fixed for a date not earlier than thirty days nor later than sixty days after service of such notice unless an earlier or a later date is set by the Farm Credit Administration at the request of any party so served.

"(b) If a party charged in a notice under subsection (a) of this section fails to appear at the hearing personally or by a duly authorized representative, such party shall be deemed to have consented to the issuance of the cease and desist order. If consent is so deemed, or if the Farm Credit Administration finds upon the record made at the hearing that any violation or unsafe or unsound practice specified in the notice of charges has been established, the Farm Credit Administration may issue and serve upon the party an order to cease and desist from the violation or practice. In addition, the order, by provisions that may be mandatory or otherwise, may require the institution or any person participating in the conduct of the affairs of the institution to cease and desist from the same and take affirmative action to correct the conditions resulting from any such violation or practice.

"(c)(1) An order issued under subsection (b) of this section shall become effective at the end of thirty days after service upon the party to whom it is directed (except in the case of a order consented to by a party, such order shall become effective at the time specified therein), and shall remain effective and enforceable as provided therein, except to the extent that it is stayed, modified, terminated, or set aside by action of the Farm Credit Administration or a reviewing court.

"SEC. 4.31. TEMPORARY CEASE AND DESIST ORDERS.—(a) Whenever the Farm Credit Administration determines that any violation or unsafe or unsound practice specified in the notice of charges issued and served upon any party under section 4.30, or the continuation thereof, is likely to cause insolvency or subtantial dissipation of assets or earnings of the institution, or is likely to seriously weaken the financial condition of the institution or otherwise seriously prejudice the interest of the stockholders of the institution prior to completion of the proceedings conducted under section 4.30, the Farm Credit Administration may issue a temporary order requiring the party to cease and desist from any such violation or practice and to take affirmative action to prevent such insolvency, dissipation, condition, or prejudice pending completion of such proceedings. Such order shall become effective upon service upon the party and, unless set aside, limited, or suspended by a court in proceedings authorized by subsection (b) of this section, shall remain effective and enforceable pending the completion of the administrative proceedings pursuant to the notice and until such time as the Farm Credit Administration dismisses the charges specified in the notice, or if a cease and desist order is issued against the party, until the effective date of such order.

"(b) Within ten days after an institution or other party has been served with a temporary cease and desist order under subsection (a) of this section, the party may apply to the United States district court for the district in which the principal office of the institution is located, or the United States District Court of the District of Columbia, for an injunction setting aside, limiting, or suspending the enforcement, operation, or effectiveness of such order pending the completion of the administrative proceedings pursuant to the notice of charges served upon the party under section 4.30, and such court shall have jurisdiction to issue such injunction.

"SEC. 4.32. ENFORCEMENT OF TEMPORARY CEASE AND DESIST ORDERS.—In the case of violation or threatened violation of, or failure to obey, a temporary cease and desist order issued under section 4.31, the Farm Credit Administration may apply to the United States district court, for the district in which the principal office of the institution is located, for an injunction to enforce such order, and if the court determines that there has been such violation or threatened violation or failure to obey, it shall be the duty of the court to issue such injunction.

"SEC. 4.33. REMOVAL OR SUSPENSION OF DIRECTOR OR OFFICER.—(a) The Farm Credit Administration may serve upon any director or officer of an institution of the Farm Credit System a written notice of its intention to remove such director or officer from office if the Farm Credit Administration has reasonable cause to believe that—

"(1) the director or officer has committed (A) any violation of law, rule, or regulation, or a cease and desist order that has become final; (B) has engaged or participated in any unsafe or unsound practice in connection with the management of the institution; or (C) has committed or engaged in any act, omission, or practice that constitutes a breach of such person's fiduciary duty as a director or officer; and

"(2)(A)(i) the institution has suffered or will probably suffer material financial loss or other damage, or the interests of its stockholders could be seriously prejudiced by reason of such violation or practice or breach of fiduciary duty; or (ii) the director or officer has received financial gain by reason of such violation or practice or breach of fiduciary duty; and

"(B) such violation or practice or breach of fiduciary duty is one that involves personal dishonesty on the part of the director or officer, or one that demonstrates a negligent, willfull, or continuing disregard for the safety or soundness of the institution.

"(b) The Farm Credit Administration may serve upon any director or officer of an institution of the Farm Credit System a written notice of its intention to remove such director or officer from office if the Farm Credit Administration has reasonable cause to believe that the director or officer, by conduct or practice with respect to any institution of the System or other business entity that resulted in substantial financial loss or other damage, has evidenced either personal dishonesty or a negligent, willful or continuing disregard for the safety and soundness of the institution, and has evidenced unfitness to continue as a director or officer.

"(c) The Farm Credit Administration may serve upon any person participating in the conduct of the affairs of an institution of the Farm Credit System written notice of its intention to prohibit such person from further participation in the conduct of the affairs of the institution whenever the Farm Credit Administration has reasonable cause to believe that such person, by conduct or practice with respect to any institution of the Farm Credit System or other business entity that resulted in substantial financial loss or other damage, has evidenced either personal dishonesty or a negligent, willful, or continuing disregard for the safety and soundness of the institution, and has evidenced unfitness to participate in the conduct of the affairs of such institution.

"(d) If the Farm Credit Administration deems it necessary for the protection of the institution or the interests of the stockholders of the institution prior to completion of proceedings under subsections (a), (b), or (c) of this section, the Farm Credit Administration may, by written notice served upon a director, officer, or other person subject to such proceedings, suspend such person from office or temporarily prohibit such person from further participation in the conduct of the affairs of the institution as the case may be. Such suspension or temporary prohibition shall become effective upon service of such notice and, unless stayed by a court in proceedings authorized by subsection (f) of this section, shall remain in effect pending the completion of the administrative proceedings pursuant to the notice served under subsections (a), (b), or (c) of this section and until such time as the Farm Credit Administration dismisses the charges specified in such notice, of if an order of removal or prohibition is issued against the person, until the effective date of any such order. A copy of any notice issued under this subsection shall be served upon the institution concerned.

"(e) Any notice served upon a person under subsections (a), (b), or (c) of this section shall contain a statement of the facts constituting the grounds therefor and shall fix a time and place at which a hearing will be held thereon. Such hearing shall be fixed for a date not earlier than thirty days no later than sixty days after the day of service of such notice, unless an earlier or a later date is a set by the Farm Credit Administration at the request of the party upon whom the notice was served. If a party upon whom the notice was served fails to appear at the hearing in person or by a duly authorized representative, such party shall be deemed to have consented to the issuance of an older of removal or prohibition. If consent is so deemed, or if the Farm Credit Administration finds upon the record made at the hearing that any of the grounds specified in such notice have been established, the Farm Credit Administration may issue such orders of removal or suspension from office, or prohibition from participation in the conduct of the affairs of the institution as it may deem appropriate. A copy of any order issued under this subsection shall be served upon the institution concerned.

"(f) An order issued under subsection (e) of this section shall become effective at the end of thirty days after service upon the party to whom it is directed (except in the case of an order consented to by a party, such order shall become effective at the time specified therein). The order shall remain effective and enforceable except to the extent that it is stayed, modified, terminated, or set aside by action of the agency or a reviewing court.

"(g) Within ten days after a director, officer, or other person participating in the conduct of the affairs of an institution of the Farm Credit System has been served a notice under subsection (d) of this section, such person may apply to the United States district court for the district in which the principal office of the institution is located, or the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, for a stay of any suspension or temporary prohibition under the order pending the completion of the administrative proceedings pursuant to the notice served under subsection (a), (b), or (c) of this section, and such court shall have jurisdiction to stay any such suspension or prohibition.

"SEC. 4.34. SUSPENSION OR REMOVAL OF A DIRECTOR OR OFFICER CHARGED WITH A FELONY.—(a) Whenever any director or officer of an institution of the Farm Credit System, or other person participating in the conduct of the affairs of such institution, is charged in any information, indictment, or complaint authorized by a United States attorney, with the commission of or participation in a crime involving dishonesty or breach of trust that is punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year under State or Federal law, the Farm Credit Administration may, by written notice served upon the person, suspend the person from office or temporarily prohibit the person from further participation in the conduct of the affairs of the institution if continued service or participation by the person poses a threat to the interests of the institution's shareholders or may threaten to impair public confidence in the institution. A copy of such notice shall also be served upon the institution concerned. Such suspension or temporary prohibition shall be effective upon service and shall remain effective and enforceable until the final disposition of such information, indictment, or complaint except to the extent that it is stayed, modified, or terminated by the Farm Credit Administration. If a judgment or conviction with respect to such crime is entered against the person, and at such time as such judgment is not subject to further appellate review, the Farm Credit Administration may issue and serve upon the person an order removing the person from office, or prohibiting the person from further participation in the conduct of the affairs of the institution except with the consent of the Farm Credit Administration, if continued service or participation by the person may pose a threat to the interests of the institution's stockholders or may threaten to impair public confidence in the institution. Such order shall be effective upon service and shall remain effective and enforceable except to the extent that it is stayed, modified, or terminated by the Farm Credit Administration. A copy of such order shall also be served upon the institution concerned. A finding of not guilty or other disposition of the charge shall not preclude the Farm Credit Administration from thereafter instituting proceedings to remove the director or officer from office or to prohibit the person from further participation in the conduct of the affairs of the institution, under section 4.33.

"(b) Within thirty days from service of any notice of suspension or temporary prohibition or any order of removal or prohibition issued pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, the person concerned may request in writing an opportunity to appear before the Farm Credit Administration to show that the continued service to or participation in the conduct of the affairs of the institution by such individual does not, or is not likely to, pose a threat to the interests of the stockholders of the institution or threaten to impair public confidence in the institution. Upon receipt of any such request, the Farm Credit Administration shall fix a time (not more than thrity days after receipt of such request, unless extended at the request of the concerned person) and place at which the person may appear, personally or through counsel, before one or more designated employees of the Farm Credit Administration to submit written materials (or, at the discretion of the Farm Credit Administration, oral testimony) and oral argument. Within sixty days of such hearings, the Farm Credit Administration shall notify the person whether the suspension or temporary prohibition will be continued, terminated, or otherwise modified, or whether the order of removal or prohibition will be rescinded or otherwise modified. Such notification shall contain a statement of the basis for the Farm Credit Administration's decision, if adverse to the director, officer, or other person.

"SEC. 4.35. HEARINGS AND JUDICIAL REVIEW. (a) Any hearing provided for in this Part (except section 4.34) shall be held in the Federal judicial district in which the principal office of the System institution is located unless the party afforded the hearing consents to another place, and shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of chapter 5 of title 5 of the United States Code. After such hearing, and within ninety days after the party has been notified that the case has been submitted by an Administrative Law Judge to the Governor for final decision, the Governor shall (1) render a decision that includes the findings of fact upon which it is based and (2) issue and serve upon each party to the proceeding an order or orders consistent with the provisions of this Part. Judicial review of any such order shall be exclusive as provided in subsection (b) of this section. Unless a petition for review is timely filed in a court of appeals of the United States, as provided in subsection (b) of this section, and thereafter until the record in the proceeding has been filed as so provided, the Farm Credit Administration may at any time, upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify, terminate, or set aside any such order. Upon such filing of the record, the Farm Credit Administration may modify, terminate, or set aside any such order with permission of the court.

"(b) Any party to the proceedings under subsection (a) of this section, or any person required by an order issued under section 4.30(b) to cease and desist from any of the violations or practices stated therein, may obtain a review of any order served pursuant to subsection (a) of this section by the filing in the court of appeals of the United States for the circuit in which the principal office of the institution is located, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, within thirty days after the date of service of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Farm Credit Administration be modified, terminated, or set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith transmitted by the clerk of the court to the Farm Credit Administration, and thereupon the Farm Credit Administration shall file in the court the record in the proceeding, as provided in section 2112 of title 28 of the United States Code. Upon the filing of such petition, such court shall have exclusive jurisdiction to affirm, modify, terminate, or set aside, in whole or in part, the order of the Farm Credit Administration. Review of such proceedings shall be had as provided in chapter 7 of title 5 of the United States Code. The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari, as provided in section 1254 of title 28 of the United States Code.

"(c) The commencement of proceedings for judicial review under subsection (b) of this section shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of any order issued by the Farm Credit Administration.

"SEC. 4.36. JURISDICTION AND ENFORCEMENT.—The Farm Credit Administration may apply to the United States district court, or the United States court of any territory, within the jurisdiction of which the principal office of the institution is located, for the enforcement of any effective and outstanding notice or order issued under this Part, and such courts shall have jurisdiction and power to order and require compliance herewith; however, except as otherwise provided in this Part, no court shall have jurisdiction to affect by injunction or otherwise the issuance or enforcement of any notice or order under this Part, or to review, modify, suspend, terminate, or set aside any such notice or order.

"SEC. 4.37. PENALTY.—(a) Any System institution or any person participating in the conduct of the affairs of such institution who (1) violates the terms of any order issued under sections 4.30 or 4.31 that has become final, or (2) violates any provision of this Act or any regulation issued under this Act by the Farm Credit Administration, shall forfeit and pay a civil penalty of not more than $1,000 per day for each day during which such violation continues. The Farm Credit Administration may, in its discretion, compromise, modify, or remit any civil money penalty that is subject to imposition or has been imposed under this section. The penalty may be assessed and collected by the Farm Credit Administration by written notice.

"(b) In determining the amount of the penalty, the Farm Credit Administration shall take into account the appropriateness of the penalty with respect to the size of financial resources and good faith of the institution or person charged, the gravity of the violation, the history of any previous violations, and such other matters as justice may require.

"(c) The System institution or person assessed shall be afforded an opportunity for a hearing by the Farm Credit Administration upon request made within ten days after issuance of the notice of assessment. In such hearing all issues shall be determined on the record pursuant to section 554 of title 5 of the United States Code. The agency determination shall be made by final order which may be reviewed only as provided in subsection (d) of this section. If no hearing is requested as herein provided, the assessment shall constitute a final and unappealable order.

"(d) Any System institution or person against whom an order imposing a civil money penalty has been entered after a hearing under this section may obtain review by the United States court of appeals for the circuit in which the principal office of the System institution is located, or the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, by filing a notice of appeal in such court within twenty days from the service of such order, and simultaneously sending a copy of such notice by registered or certified mail to the Farm Credit Administration. The Farm Credit Administration shall promptly certify and file in such court the record upon which the penalty was imposed, as provided in section 2112 of title 28 of the United States Code. The findings of the Farm Credit Administration shall be set aside if found to be unsupported by substantial evidence as provided by section 706(2)(E) of title 5 of the United States Code.

"(e) If any System institution or person fails to pay an assessement after it has become a final and unappealable order or after the court of appeals has entered final judgment in favor of the Farm Credit Administration, the Farm Credit Administration shall refer the matter to the Attorney General, who shall recover the amount assessed by action in the appropriate United States district court. In such action, the validity and appropriateness of the final order imposing the penalty shall not be subject to review.

"(f) All penalties collected under authority of this section shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

"SEC. 4.38. FORFEITURE OF FRANCHISE.—If the directors of any System institution shall knowingly violate, or knowingly permit any person participating in the conduct of the affairs of the institution to violate any of the provisions of this Act, all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the institution shall be thereby forfeited. Such violation shall be determined and adjudged by a district court of the United States in a suit brought for that purpose by the Farm Credit Administration, in its own name, before the institution shall be declared dissolved.

"SEC. 4.39. REPLACEMENT OF SUSPENDED OR REMOVED DIRECTORS.—If, at any time, because of the suspension or removal of one or more directors pursuant to sections 4.33 or 4.34, there shall be on the board of directors of a System institution less than a quorum of directors not so suspended, all powers and functions vested in or exercisable by such board shall vest in and be exercisable by the director or directors on the board not so suspended or removed, until such time as there shall be a quorum of the board of directors. In the event one or more of the directors of a System institution are removed, the Governor shall appoint persons to serve temporarily as directors in their place and stead pending any appeal of such removal until such time as those who have been removed are reinstated or their respective successors are duly elected and take office.

"SEC. 4.40. DEFINITIONS.—As used in this Part—

"(a) the phrases 'cease and desist order that has become final' and 'order that has become final' mean a cease and desist order, or an order, issued by the Farm Credit Administration with the consent of the System institution or the director or officer or other person concerned, or with respect to which no petition for review of the action of the Farm Credit Administration has been filed and perfected in a court of appeals as specified in section 4.35(b) or with respect to which the action of the court in which said petition is so filed is not subject to further review by the Supreme Court of the United States in proceedings provided for in section 4.35(b), or an order issued under section 4.34 (a) or (c);

"(b) the term 'violate' means to act (alone or with one or more persons) for or toward causing, bringing about, participating in, counseling, or aiding or abetting a violation; and

"(c) the term 'violation' includes without limitation any action (alone or with one or more persons) for or toward causing, bringing about, participating in, counseling, or aiding or abetting a violation.

"SEC. 4.41. NOTICE OF SERVICE.—Any service required or authorized to be made by the Farm Credit Administration under this Part may be made by registered mail, or in such other manner reasonably calculated to give actual notice as the Farm Credit Administration may by regulation, or otherwise provide. Copies of any notice or order served by the Farm Credit Administration upon any association or any director or officer thereof or other person participating in the conduct of its affairs, pursuant to the provisions of this Part, shall also be sent to the supervisory bank.

"SEC. 4.42. ANCILLARY PROVISIONS; SUBPOENA POWER.—In the course of, or in connection with, any proceeding under this Part, the Farm Credit Administration, or any designated representative thereof, including any person designated to conduct any hearing under this Part, shall have the power to administer oaths and affirmations, to take or cause to be taken depositions, and to issue, revoke, quash, or modify subpoenas and subpoenas duces tecum. The Farm Credit Administration shall make rules and regulations with respect to any such proceedings, claims, examinations, or investigations. The attendance of witnesses and the production of documents provided for in this section may be required from any place in any State or in any territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States at any designated place where such proceeding is being conducted. The Farm Credit Administration or any party to proceedings under this Part may apply to the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, or the United States district court for the district in which such proceeding is being conducted, or where the witness resides or carries on business, for enforcement of any subpoena or subpoena duces tecum issued pursuant to this section and such courts shall have jurisdiction and power to order and require compliance therewith. Witnesses subpoenaed under this section shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the district courts of the United States. Any court having jurisdiction of any proceeding instituted under this Part or any System institution or other party, may allow to any such party such reasonable expenses and attorneys' fees as it deems just and proper; and such expenses and fees shall be paid by the institution or from its assets. Any person who willfully fails or refuses to attend and testify or to answer any lawful inquiry or to produce books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, contracts, agreements, or other records if in such person's power so to do, in obedience to the subpoena of the Farm Credit Administration, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000, or to imprisonment for a term of not more than one year or both.

"SEC. 4.43. LIABILITY OF DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS.—If the directors or officers of any institution of the Farm Credit System knowingly violate, or permit any director, officer, or other person participating in the conduct of the affairs of any institution of the Farm Credit System to violate, any provision of this Act or rules or regulatons of the Farm Credit Administration issued under this Act, any director and officer participating in or assenting to such violation shall be held personally liable for all damages that the institution, its stockholders, or other persons sustained in consequence of such violation.".

SEC. 3. Section 4.12 of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 (12 U.S.C. 2183) is amended by—

(1) in subsection (a), deleting the last sentence thereof; and

(2) adding a new subsection (c) as follows:

"(c) The Governor may require two or more System institutions operating under the same title of merge when the Governor determines that (i) one or more such institutions (A) is insolvent, (B) is not financially viable, (C) has failed to comply with the provisions of an order issued under Part F of title IV of this Act, or (D) has otherwise failed to conduct its operations in accordance with this Act; or (ii) the merger would be in furtherance of more efficient and effective service to borrowers."

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

SECTION 1. This section provides that this Act may be cited as the "Farm Credit Administration Improvement Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. This section amends Title IV of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 by adding a new Part F containing the following sections:

Section 4.30 authorizes the Farm Credit Administration to issue cease and desist orders against any institution of the Farm Credit System or any director, officer, employee, agent, or other person involved in the conduct of the affairs of such institution. The order would issue upon a finding that the entity or other party is engaged in an unsafe or unsound practice or is in violation of any law, rule, or regulation. Any party so charged would be afforded an opportunity for a hearing before the issuance of a final order. Such orders are appealable in accordance with section 4.35.

Section 4.31 authorizes the Farm Credit Administration to issue temporary cease and desist orders if the Farm Credit Administration determines that a delay is likely to cause the insolvency or substantial dissipation of assets or earnings of the institution or is likely to seriously weaken the condition of the institution or otherwise seriously prejudice the interests of its stockholders. Temporary orders are appealable to a United States district court.

Section 4.32 authorizes the Farm Credit Administration to apply to a United States district court to enforce a temporary cease and desist order.

Section 4.33 authorizes the Farm Credit Administration to issue a written notice of intention to remove from office any director or officer of an institution of the Farm Credit System if such director or officer has been found to have violated any law, rule or regulation or cease and desist order that has become final, to have engaged in unsafe or unsound practices, or to have breached a fiduciary duty, and the Farm Credit Administration determines that the institution has or will suffer substantial financial loss or the interests of the stockholders of the institution have been or will be seriously prejudiced if the director or officer is not removed. This section also provides authority for the Farm Credit Administration to prohibit any person, including a director or officer, from engaging in the conduct of the affairs of an institution. Any party issued a notice of removal or prohibition would be afforded an opportunity for a hearing before issuance of a final order under this section. Authority is also provided for the Farm Credit Administration to suspend such directors or officers from office or to temporarily prohibit any person from engaging in the conduct of the affairs of an institution pending completion of administrative action on the permanent removal or prohibition.

Section 4.34 authorizes the Farm Credit Administration to remove a director or officer from office, or to prohibit any person from engaging in the conduct of the affairs of an institution of the Farm Credit System if such person is indicted for a felony involving dishonesty or breach of trust. Such person is entitled to a hearing before the Farm Credit Administration regarding such action.

Section 4.35 establishes the procedures for administrative hearings and judicial reviews of the proceedings described in sections 4.30, 4.31, 4.32, and 4.33.

Section 4.36 authorizes the Farm Credit Administration to apply to any district court of the United States with jurisdiction for the enforcement of any outstanding notice or order.

Section 4.37 provides that any institution of the Farm Credit System or any director, officer, employee, agent, and other persons participating in its affairs are liable for a civil penalty if such institution or other party has been found to be in violation of the terms of any final order or any provision of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 or regulations issued thereunder. The penalty shall be not more than $1,000 per day for each day the violation continues. The institution or person against whom such a penalty is assessed may request a formal hearing on the record. A final order assessing a penalty is appealable to an appropriate court of appeals of the United States. The Attorney General of the United States may take action at the request of the Farm Credit Administration to collect any unpaid assessment that has become final and unappealable. All penalties collected are to be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Section 4.38 provides that an institution of the Farm Credit System is subject to the forfeiture of all its rights, privileges, and franchises if the directors of the institution knowingly violate, or permit others to violate, any provisions of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 or regulations issued thereunder. Such violations must be adjudged in an appropriate district court of the United States in a suit commenced by the Farm Credit Administration.

Section 4.39 authorizes the board of an institution of the Farm Credit System to conduct business with its remaining members as a quorum where one or more members have been suspended or removed. The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is authorized to appoint temporary replacements for directors who have been removed.

Section 4.40 contains definitions applicable to the new provisions.

Section 4.41 contains the provisions governing the required service of process.

Section 4.42 contains ancillary authorities provided in connection with the proceedings authorized under the new provisions, including the power to administer oaths, take depositions, and issue subpoenas, among other things.

Section 4.43 provides that directors and officers of institutions of the Farm Credit System who knowingly violate, or permit others to violate, any provisions of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 or regulations issued thereunder shall be personally liable for all damages suffered by the institution, its stockholders, or others as a consequence of such action.

SEC. 3. This section would amend section 4.12 of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 to authorize the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration to require the merger of two or more like institutions of the Farm Credit System (1) when such institutions are insolvent, are not financially viable, have failed to comply with an order issued under Part F of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 as added by section 2, or have failed to conduct their operations in accordance with the Farm Credit Act of 1971; or (2) when such merger would provide more efficient and effective service to borrowers.

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION,
February 5, 1985.

Hon. EDWARD ZORINSKY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR ZORINSKY: This responds to your request that the Farm Credit Administration ("FCA") provide, as a drafting service, a bill which would provide the FCA with the same enforcement powers currently held by the other financial institution regulatory agencies and to direct the FCA to study the feasibility of establishing an insurance fund to protect Farm Credit System ("System") institutions and their stockholders from losses. The enclosed bill would provide the FCA with the enforcement powers of the other Federal financial regulatory agencies except to the extent that the activities of the other agencies and the institutions they regulate that are similar from those of the FCA and the System institutions. Following is a brief summary of the provisions of the draft bill:

SECTION I. Would amend Title IV of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 by adding a new Part F containing the following sections:

Section 4.30 would authorize the FCA to issue cease and desist orders against any System institution or director, officer, employee, agent or other person when such institution or person is engaging in an unsafe or unsound practice or is violating any law, rule or regulation, or any condition imposed by the FCA. Such entity or person would be afforded an opportunity for a hearing before the issuance of a final order. Such orders are appealable in accordance with section 4.35.

Section 4.31 authorizes the FCA to issue temporary cease and desist orders which are immediately effective, under circumstances where the FCA determines that a delay is likely to cause the insolvency or substantial dissipation of assets or earnings of the institution or is likely to seriously weaken the condition of the institution or otherwise seriously prejudice the interest of its stockholders. Temporary orders are appealable to a United States District Court.

Section 4.32 authorizes the FCA to apply to a United States District Court to enforce a temporary cease and desist order.

Section 4.33 authorizes the FCA to issue a written notice of intention to remove from office, any director or officer of a System institution who has violated any law, rule or regulation or cease and desist order which has become final, has engaged in unsafe or unsound practices, or has breached a fiduciary duty, if the FCA determines that the institution has or will suffer substantial financial loss, if the interest of its stockholders could be seriously prejudiced or as otherwise provided. This section also authorizes the FCA to temporarily suspend such persons, effective immediately, pending the completion of the administrative process associated with the removal hearing. A person against whom a removal petition has been filed may request a formal hearing on the record. Following a determination of the facts by an administrative law judge, the Governor of the FCA would make a final detemination regarding the issuance of the order. The order is effective unless and until appealed to a United States District Court.

Section 4.34 authorizes the FCA to remove a director or officer of a System institution or other person participating in the affairs of such institution, when any such person is indicted for a felony involving dishonesty or a breach of trust. Such person is also entitled to a hearing before the agency regarding such action.

Section 4.35 establishes the procedures for administrative hearings and judicial reviews of the proceedings described in Sections 4.30, 4.31, 4.32, and 4.33.

Section 4.36 authorizes the FCA to apply to any district court with jurisdiction, for the enforcement of any outstanding notice or order.

Section 4.37 provides that any System institution or its officers, directors, employees, agents or other persons participating in its affairs, who violate the terms of any final order are liable for a civil money penalty of not more than $1,000 per day during which such violation continues. Institutions or persons against whom such penalties are assessed may request a formal hearing on the record. A final order assessing such a penalty is appealable to an appropriate United States Court of Appeals. The FCA may refer to the Attorney General any matter involving a person who has failed to pay an assessment after it has become a final and unappealable order. All penalties collected are covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Section 4.38 provides that when any director of a System institution knowingly violates any provisions of the Farm Credit Act or regulations issued pursuant thereto, the institution is subject to the forfeiture of all its rights, privileges and franchises. Such violations must be adjudged in an appropriate district court in a suit commenced by the FCA. This section further provides that any System institution or officer, director, employee, agent or any other person participating in its affairs who violates any provision of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 or regulations issued pursuant thereto can be assessed a civil money penalty of not more than $1,000 per day during which such violation continues. Civil money penalties under this section are subject to the same administrative review and judicial appeal as applies to civil money penalties associated with violations of cease and desist orders.

Section 4.39 authorizes the board of an institution to conduct business with its remaining members as a quorum where one or more members have been suspended or removed, and authorizes the Governor of the FCA to appoint temporary replacements for directors who have been removed.

Section 4.40 contains definitions applicable to the new provisions.

Section 4.41 contains the provisions governing the required service of process.

Section 4.42 contains ancillary authorities provided in connection with the proceedings authorized under this part, including the power to administer oaths, take depositions, issue subpoenas, etc.

Section 4.43 provides that directors and officers of System institutions who knowingly violate or permit the violation by others of any provision of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 or regulations issued thereunder shall be held liable in their personal and individual capacities or all damages suffered by such institution as a consequence of such actions.

SECTION II also amends section 4.12 of the 1971 Act by expanding the authority of the FCA to require the merger of one or more like System institutions.

SECTION III directs the FCA to conduct a study and issue a report regarding the feasibility of establishing an insurance fund to protect System institutions in the event of losses or for other purposes.

As you know, this draft has been provided to you as a service and the FCA takes no position at this time in support of, or opposition to any bill that may be introduced. We trust that this responds fully to your request.

Sincerely,

DONALD E. WILKINSON,
Governor.

By Mr. ROTH (for himself and Mr. PELL):

S. 467. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to authorize the President to award prisoner of war medals in appropriate cases; to the Committee on Armed Services.

AWARDING OF PRISONER OF WAR MEDALS

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am proud to introduce today a bill that will formally recognize that character of military service which arises under the most hostile and difficult of circumstances—that of being a prisoner of war.

The prisoner of war medal, which will be authorized under this legislation will, like other military badges, identify the wearer as having given special service to his country. We have long recognized the sacrifices of our men and women under arms. A sophisticated system of awards and decorations recognize meritorious service, outstanding achievement, and heroism in action. Likewise, a wide range of veteran's benefits seek to compensate former service members for both interrupted lives and disabilities incurred while in the Armed Forces. Yet, it is worth remembering that wartime service does not impose an equal burden on all who serve.

Many provide valuable services without having to risk direct exposure to enemy fire. Of those who are combatants, some are wounded and smaller number are killed. Even fewer are taken prisoner. Yet, the prisoner of war must serve under extraordinarily difficult circumstances. Held in hostile confinement, often physically and psychologically abused, he does not know if, when, or how his imprisonment will end. He may be subjected to pressures that break his health and defeat his spirit. Some have been murdered. For many, the pains of imprisonment at the hands of the enemy remain for life.

It is not our place to sit in judgment of those who were taken prisoner of war. We cannot know what they felt or the thoughts that came to them in bamboo cages, isolated stalags and oflags, or frozen mines. What we do know is that they served when they were called. Only the true fighting man comes close enough to the enemy to be captured. That he is not listed among the slain is due to the infinite care of providence. While captive, most exhibited extraordinary gallantry; others simply tried to survive within the limits of their ability. Some could not cope.

A prisoner of war medal would signify service in that status. It would acknowledge military service under the most difficult circumstances a soldier, sailor, or airman can endure. It would simply be an overdue recognition by the people of the United States that the individual forfeited his freedom in the cause of freedom.●

By Mr. INOUYE:

S. 468. A bill for the relief of Mark Maio Fernandez; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF MARK MAIO FERNANDEZ

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, Mark Maio Fernandez was born on March 14, 1958, at Tripler Army Medical Center in Honolulu, HI. He was one of two twin boys born 6 weeks premature, weighing 2.5 pounds. According to the records, he became jaundiced sometime on his second or third day of life, and his jaundice condition was noticed on the third day and yielded a microbilirubin test result of 25.5 mg. A subsequent test yielded a result of 32.6 mg. bilirubin.

Excessive bilirubin is believed to be the cause of brain damage. Although it is alleged that a blood transfusion should have occurred when the bilirubin count reached 20 mg., no transfusion was performed until the 32.6-percent level.

Mr. Fernandez's brother, Wayne, is 6 feet 5 inches and graduated from the University of Hawaii in 1981. He is normal, bright and will be a police officer with the Honolulu Police Department. Mark Fernandez is a young man with serious brain damage and a limited IQ slightly above the level of mental retardation. He suffers from deafness and spasticity in his lower limbs. At 5 feet 5 inches, he is 1 foot shorter than his twin brother.

As a result of his handicaps, he attended the Hawaii School for the Deaf and Blind. Although he can understand and utilize sign language, apparently his level of communication is elementary, and he is limited in his ability to deal with such ordinary matters such as money or caring for himself. In an attempt to assist himself, he has found employment as a janitor at a fast food restaurant, but his earning capacity is obviously severely restricted for the rest of his life.

In 1976, after reading about a similar case, his parents sought legal counsel and filed an administrative suit with the Department of the Army. His attorneys feel that his claims were and are strong, and medical experts from both Hawaii and the mainland testified about medical negligence and the relationship of this failure to administer a timely transfusion to the subsequent brain damage.

The trial court ruled that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed, based on the theory that his parents should have known of the medical malpractice earlier since they were given a discharge report by the treating physician at Tripler Army Medical Center, from which they could have derived knowledge of the action.

However, the decision overlooks the fact that Mark's parents are not highly educated. Further, the report is technical and meaningless to one not trained in medicine. I believe that the members of the subcommittee will concur that the language used therein would not unduly alarm those without medical knowledge.

The bill provides only that the U.S. District Court for the District of Hawaii have jurisdiction to hear and try the case notwithstanding the statute of limitations, laches or any previous dismissal. It does not provide any direct relief for the claimant.

I ask the subcommittee to act favorably to this bill.●

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself and Mr. PROXMIRE):

S. 469. A bill to rescind certain budget authority proposed to be rescinded in a special message transmitted to the Congress by the President on February 6, 1985, in accordance with section 1012 of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974 and section 2901 of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984; pursuant to the order of January 30, 1975, referred jointly to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Appropriations.

APPROVAL OF CERTAIN BUDGET RESCISSIONS

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, on April 26, 1984, the Senate overwhelmingly adopted my amendment to the Deficit Reduction Act, calling for spending cuts and debt collection savings totaling $4,360,000,000 in fiscal year 1985. Specifically, by a vote of 78 to 15, this body approved reductions in: Government travel (−$750,000,000); consultant services (−$1 billion); public affairs, public relations, public information and advertising (−$100 million); publishing, printing, reproduction, and audiovisual services (−$250 million); Federal motor vehicle spending (−$160 million); and debt collection (−$2.1 billion). A House-Senate Conference Committee adopted my amendment in principle by directing the Office of Management and Budget to develop a plan to achieve these savings in fiscal 1985. Now, nearly 10 months since the amendment passed the Senate, the President has submitted a package of rescissions to implement a portion of the mandated savings called for in what is now section 2901 of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984.

Mr. President, the bill that I am introducing today for myself and the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin, Senator PROXMIRE, would implement every one of the 226 rescissions submitted by the President on February 6 (H. Doc. 99-24) to implement section 2901. Those rescissions, covering most Federal agencies, Commissions, Departments and boards, total $371,994,000 in new budget authority that will be saved if this bill is adopted by both Houses of Congress.

Let me say early on, that I am extremely disappointed with the total rescission package that has been submitted by the President. Excluding the debt collection savings which, I understand, will be submitted under separate legislation, the total aggregate savings in this rescission package is only 16.4 percent of the spending cuts called for in my amendment. In all fairness to the Office of Management and Budget, it appears that they made every effort to force the agencies and departments to submit the necessary savings to reach the total spending cuts called for in section 2901. But, in true bureaucratic form, the agencies' response was the usual wringing of hands and cries of woe that they couldn't give up that extra consultant service; those extra few trips around the country; those few extra Xerox machines sitting in the basement somewhere in downtown D.C.; or that car that is used to drive non-law-enforcement officials around town or back and forth to work. For example, the department with the biggest consultant budget and the largest travel budget—the Department of Defense—did not contribute one dime to savings in any of the five savings categories outlined in the amendment or in the OMB bulletins. The Office of Personnel Management—an agency that has been pounding Federal workers to do more with less—did not contribute one nickel in savings for travel out of their overall $106.6 million budget. Even NASA—an agency whose budget has done rather well during the past 4 years of this administration—told OMB and the taxpayers of America that they can't give up one penny of their consultant services budget to help reduce the deficit. On the bright side, the Department of Labor met 72 percent of its savings target established by OMB. So, as the Labor Department has shown, it can be done if the agency or department head is committed to cutting costs and saving the taxpayers some serious money.

Mr. President, even though the total rescission package is not as large as I would have liked, it is a beginning. For the past 4 years, Senator MATTINGLY of Georgia; Senator PRYOR of Arkansas, Senator SASSER of Tennessee; former Senator RANDOLPH of West Virginia; and others have joined me in fighting to cut these wasteful, low priority administrative overhead expenditures without much luck. Now, after a smashing victory last April, we are beginning to see a trickle of hope that maybe the Federal agencies are finally looking at these unnecessary costs and reducing them. We must pass this bill in both Houses and send it to the President for his signature—right now, before we lose even these small savings that have been so hard to come by.

Mr. President, I am pleased to see that the President has included a 10-percent reduction in agency administrative costs as part of his fiscal year 1986 budget. This cutback would save $535 million in budget authority next year. Although this is a good start, I believe at least five times that amount could be saved in fiscal year 1986, just in the five spending categories contained in section 2901 and the amendment that passed the Senate last year. I intend to offer an amendment to the first available deficit reduction bill this year to build on the President's cuts in administrative overhead and rollback travel, consultants, public relations, and other low priority activities even further. In the meantime, it is essential that the Congress pass this bill to adopt the rescissions submitted to the Congress by the President on February 6.

Mr. President, I urge the swift passage of this bill by the House and Senate so that we can begin to make a dent in waste, fraud and abuse, and in the skyrocketing Federal deficit. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point. I also ask unanimous consent that a summary of the specific rescissions contained in the President's February 6 submission be printed in the RECORD prior to the printing of the bill.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. RIEGLE:

S. 470. A bill to require the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to make annual determinations under 46(f)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 relating to the sufficiency of domestic gas supply; to the Committee on Finance.

DOMESTIC GAS SUPPLY

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which will modify a minor provision of law, but one which may reduce the cost of natural gas to thousands of consumers throughout the Nation. The legislation would require an annual review of the domestic supply of natural gas by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC). This review, which is authorized by section 46(f) of the Internal Revenue Code, has not been conducted since 1972. The finding made in the review is used to determine the amount of tax benefits earned from the Investment Tax Credit and retained by interstate natural gas pipeline companies. These tax credits reduce capital costs of pipeline companies, but are ignored by FERC in determining rates that pipelines can charge to local distribution companies. As a result, local distribution companies pay rates that are probably higher than they should be, and ultimately the consumer must pay higher rates, as well.

FERC is able to ignore these credits because of a determination made in 1972 that natural gas was in short supply, and that there was every indication that the shortage would continue. My legislation would simply mandate that FERC make this important finding on an annual basis. It is my belief that a decision of this magnitude must be reviewed and updated. It has been 13 years since the original decision, and the natural gas market is fundamentally different today than it was in 1972.

Mr. President, this legislation seeks to ensure that a governmental ruling which involves billions of dollars is reexamined on a periodic basis. It is sound public policy, and wholly logical that FERC review the original decision, and once again determine whether the current policy accurately reflects the facts of today's natural gas market.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 470

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) of paragraph (1) of Section 46(f) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to limitation of investment tax credit in case of certain regulated companies) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The determination described in the immediately preceding sentence shall be made annually."

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to calendar years beginning after December 31, 1984.●

By Mr. DODD (for himself and Mr. MELCHER):

S. 471. A bill to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 and the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a 100-percent tax credit for small contributions to candidates for the Senate of the United States who agree to abide in the general election by an overall spending limit and a limit on the use of personal funds; to create a new overall limit on contributions by nonparty multicandidate political committees to Senate election campaigns; to provide Senate candidates with the ability to respond free or at reduced costs to independent expenditures made against a candidate or in favor of the candidates opponent; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

SENATE CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM ACT

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation designed to increase the role of small contributors in the election of Senators.

It has been more than 10 years since any major campaign financing legislation has passed and the system is in serious need of repair. No reform effort is successful forever and we must be prepared to make further changes as the need becomes apparent. The 1974 reforms produced some major successes, the most prominent of which was public financing of presidential campaigns. In addition, public disclosure of contributions has enabled the people to see who contributes to elections campaigns, and limitations on the amounts individuals can contribute have eliminated some of the scandals of the early 1970's.

At the same time, the 1974 reforms had some unintended consequences. First, the public financing of presidential races moved the private money that used to be spent on those races into congressional races. Then, when the Supreme Court struck down the expenditure limitations for congressional races contained in the 1974 law, the costs of campaigns took off. Finally, the 1974 legislation authorized the creation of political action committees (PAC's) and those PAC's have become a major source of funding for congressional elections.

A Common Cause analysis developed some very disturbing statistics about the cost of Senate elections. The analysis found that "the Senate campaign expenditures—when looked at in terms of voting age populations—have almost doubled over 1982 to $1.28 in 1984 (as of mid-October in each year)."

If we are going to change the present system of campaign financing, however, first the political climate must be right for it. I believe that we are starting to see a reaction among lawmakers and the special interests that could grow to match the public's concern with the present system. In the last Congress, more and more Senators of both parties introduced bills designed to cure the problems of the system. I think we're approaching the point where all parties see the system spinning out of control.

But if the political climate is ripe, how do we translate that climate into legislation that can pass the Congress? I think the answer lies in first agreeing upon a list of objectives. Any such list would certainly include the creation of a system that would make it easier for individual candidates to obtain the money necessary to run an effective campaign without having to depend upon great personal wealth or spending exhausting months in fundraising and without having to rely on special interest money. I think we need a system that increases the influence of individuals.

I believe the system proposed in the bill I am introducing today, the Senate Campaign Finance Reform Act of 1985, addresses those objectives, but I am less concerned about its details than I am in initiating a dialog that can lead to passage of good reform legislation.

The basic concept behind my bill would be to authorize a 100-percent tax credit for contributions to the general election campaigns of Senators who chose to limit their expenditures to certain specific amounts. Because the bill would curtail the existing tax deductions for political contributions, it is anticipated that the bill would have no revenue impact on the Government.

Specifically, the bill would apply only to general election campaigns for the U.S. Senate. To weed out frivolous candidates, the bill would not permit a candidate to receive tax creditable contributions unless the candidate had already received threshold contributions amounting to 5 percent of the expenditure limit for the State—which is determined by a formula utilizing voting age population. At least 80 percent of the threshold amount would have to be received from individuals who reside in the State in which the general election is to be held.

A candidate who had raised the threshold amount in the prescribed way, and had agreed to abide by the expenditure limits, would be entitled to receive tax creditable contributions from individuals. A person who contributed to the general election campaign of a qualified candidate for the Senate could get a 100-percent tax credit for contributions up to $100 to any candidate, with a maximum available credit of $200 to all qualified candidates in an election. It is believed that the tax credit would be no more costly than the existing credit of 50 percent for all contributions up to a limit of $50 per individual, because the bill would repeal the existing tax credit for Senate candidates and would make the present tax credit for other political contributions available only once during the 2-year election cycle.

The campaign expenditure limits would be equal to $500,000 plus 15 cents for each person of voting age in the State—plus the amount presently permitted for political party spending. Spending limits would range from $629,750 in Alaska to $4,798,419 in California with a limit of $1,048,842 in Connecticut. Candidates and their families could contribute only $35,000 and nonparty PAC receipts would be limited to 20 percent of the candidate's expenditure limitation. The PAC limit would apply for both qualified and nonqualified candidates.

If a qualified candidate has a serious opponent who does not choose to participate in the tax credit system, the limits on overall expenditures and the use of personal funds would be lifted for the qualified candidate.

The bill also addresses the question of independent expenditures. Where any broadcast station carries independent expenditures ads in oppositon to a qualified candidate or in support of the candidate's opponent, the candidate would be eligible to receive an equal amount of free time from that station. Qualified candidates also would be eligible for the low-cost postage rates now available to political parties to respond to nonbroadcast independent expenditures.

I think the approach of my bill would go a long way toward achieving the objective of making it easier for candidates to raise the money needed to air their views without having to depend upon personal wealth or special interest money. Clearly it would strengthen the importance of individuals. Further, it has the advantage of achieving these goals without imposing an additional burden on Federal Government revenues, in a nonbureaucratic method, and by permitting individuals to designate the specific beneficiaries of their contributions.

Finally, while I do not think it is good policy to condition legislation on the preservation of short-term advantages, I think it is important to note that this bill would not adversely affect the major existing advantages of the Democratic and Republican parties. People would still be able to volunteer their time and efforts to aid candidates without having their work be counted against the candidate's expenditure limitations. Similarly, the party with sophisticated lists of small contributors and large funds would be well situated to continue to exercise those advantages.

Mr. President, in closing, I would like to reiterate that the system of campaign financing in this country is seriously broken and needs to be fixed. We all know that and the people know it even better than we do. While I am not wedded to every provision of this bill, I hope it can serve as the basis for a serious bipartisan effort to reform the present system.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in full after my statement.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. COHEN, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. NUNN, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mr. STAFFORD):

S. 472. A bill to amend title V of the Social Security Act and section 2102 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981, to modify the terminology relating to certain disabled children; to the Committee on Finance.

TERMINOLOGY RELATING TO PERSONS WITH DISABILITIES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today I introduce legislation to amend the Social Security Act to modify the terminology relating to physically disabled persons.

The purpose of this bill is straightforward. It will strike the words "crippled" and "crippling" wherever they appear in the statute and insert in lieu thereof the terms "physically disabled" and "physical disability" respectively. This legislation would in no way change the intent of the Social Security Act.

The terminology used to refer to persons with disabilities is important. Language often persists in reinforcing attitudinal barriers which are more difficult than physical barriers to eliminate. The words we use, often rooted in archaic concepts of dependency and helplessness, can continue to perpetuate negative attitudes and corresponding patterns of response and expectation.

I believe that it is time that we modernize the Social Security Act so that it reflects a positive attitude in portraying persons with disabilities. I therefore encourage you, my colleagues, to support this legislation.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I am pleased to have the opportunity to join the distinguished majority leader Mr. DOLE in support of this bill which will simply, yet significantly, alter the terminology used to refer to disabled children in that portion of the Social Security Act which relates to the Maternal and Child Health Services block grant. Passage of this measure will eliminate the use of the words crippled and crippling which imply helplessness and will substitute the more appropriate terms "physically disabled" and "physical disability."

For several years I have had the pleasure of meeting with representatives of the Georgia Council on Developmental Disabilities, an organization of 30 members appointed by the Governor to work for improving the lives of developmentally disabled persons. Last June, during a meeting in my office, I met Cheryl VanDiviere, an active council member from St. Simons Island, GA. Cheryl and the other council members present described some of their successful efforts to increase and improve services for people with disabilities in Georgia. The Georgia Council has been especially concerned about improving the public's perception of the physically and mentally challenged. The council's media campaign entitled "Yes, I Can!", which includes a television spot featuring Secretary of State Max Cleland, a triple amputee, is highly acclaimed.

While acknowledging that the Council of Developmental Disabilities has accomplished a great deal, Cheryl also reminded us that it is a difficult job to change the attitudes of the public toward disabled persons. Cheryl is a bright, articulate woman who is paraplegic and uses a wheelchair. She described a common problem she encounters as a disabled person—a barrier of prejudice and misunderstanding rather than a physical barrier. On several occasions when meeting people for the first time, Cheryl has found that people consider her handicap to mean that she is totally incapacitated—incapable of speaking, hearing, or understanding. People talk about her to her companions as if she cannot comprehend their comments. For some reason, the wheelchair is viewed, not as a means for mobility, but as a symbol of helplessness. The experience has made Cheryl angry and frustrated—and even more determined to continue working to educate the public about disabled people.

The elimination of words such as "crippled" and "crippling" from our statutes seems to be a small step toward educating the public, but it is an important one. Through language we communicate our thoughts and our attitudes. The attitude of the Federal Government should be positive; we should not encumber disabled persons with outdated words and attitudes which imply that they are helpless and crippled. We should speak with words that provide hope and that recognize the potential of all persons who are physically or mentally challenged.

S. 473. A bill to amend the Clayton Act to temporarily prohibit hostile corporate takeovers of domestic petroleum corporations; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MORITORIUM OF HOSTILE TAKEOVER OF DOMESTIC PETROLEUM CORPORATIONS

● Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, earlier this month I introduced a bill and cosponsored another bill that were designed to remove some of the tax incentives that make the hostile takeover of corporations attractive. I have always felt that the Government should stay out of the merger business, except to guard against antitrust violations. And I still feel that way.

However, it is increasingly apparent that the Federal Government has been and is involved in these affairs due to the structure of our Tax Code. The Government in effect gives incentives to speculators to attack corporations purely in the short-term interest of their pocketbook, not in the interest of our country, the company, its employees, or the local communities. The Tax Code actually subsidizes these corporate raiders.

This is not free enterprise. I will defend the free enterprise system anytime and anywhere, but what we are seeing now is abuses of our free enterprise system. The most recent hostile takeover attempts are not being engineered by persons knowledgeable and able to run the acquired companies, but by persons who would dismantle and dismember these corporate citizens without a second thought.

Today I am introducing with Senator BOREN a bill to impose a 6-month moratorium on the hostile takeover of any large petroleum and/or natural gas corporation. This bill is unlike those that I have opposed in the past. This bill only deals with hostile takeovers, not all mergers. Second, this bill simply prohibits these hostile attempts, but does not add permanent restrictions on lease rights or other long-term prohibitions that previous bills proposed.

Third, previous bills suggested moratoriums while there were no plans of what to do in the interim. Well there are two bills now before the Senate Finance Committee and a third one that was introduced today. I encourage my colleagues to first move on this bill and then during the moratoria to examine closely these three bills I mentioned and other bills which would have the effect of making the Federal Government neutral on the merger question.

If the current Treasury tax simplification proposal is suggesting that interest deductibility on second homes should be denied, then it is certainly appropriate for the Senate to consider ending the deductibility on loans used to finance hostile takeovers. This is just one example of a possible step we could take during this moratoria period that would put a stop to these current abuses in our free enterprise system.●

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, today I am joining Senator NICKLES in introducing legislation to impose a temporary moratorium on hostile takeovers of domestic petroleum corporations. Congressman MICKEY EDWARDS has introduced similar legislation in the House of Representatives.

Vast sums of scarce credit are being consumed by these mergers. The present Tax Code also appears to encourage certain kinds of mergers. It is simply wrong to allow speculators motivated purely by personal financial gain to get tax benefits and to use up precious capital resources to destroy responsible corporate citizens and imperil thousands of jobs.●

S. 475. A bill to amend the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act to require certain information to be filed in registering the title of motor vehicles, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

ODOMETER TAMPERING BILL

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which seeks to remedy one of the largest consumer frauds being perpetrated on the American public; automobile and truck odometer rollback. This consumer fraud is not only one of the largest in terms of the number of consumers being defrauded, but it is also one of the most costly consumer frauds. It has been conservatively estimated that over 3 million used cars sold each year have had their odometers rolled back. It is also estimated that the average mileage reduction on a used car on which the odometer has been rolled back is 30,000 miles. This is equal to almost 3 years of driving by the average American.

The cost of this fraud to the consumer is even more astounding. The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration estimates the cost of odometer tampering to consumers is in excess of $2 billion annually. This amounts to an average cost to consumers of approximately $750 per car in cases where the odometer has been rolled back. However, because of the difficulty in tracing and identifying cars on which odometers have been rolled back, and the number of cars on which odometers have been rolled back, the number of cars involved, and the total cost to consumers may be substantially greater than current estimates indicate. Even more alarming is the fact that the practice of odometer rollback is increasing each year. Not only is this particular consumer fraud extremely lucrative, but in addition, it can be perpetrated with very little risk of ever being caught.

Mr. President, this is an extremely difficult problem to eliminate entirely, but certainly steps can be taken and should be taken to help enforcement agencies, as well as the general public, in identifying those vehicles which have odometers which have been rolled back. This bill is designed to create a record of odometer readings throughout the life of the vehicle which will greatly assist law enforcement personnel and individual used car consumers in identifying cars with tampered odometers.

Under current law, it is extremely difficult to identify cars on which the odometer has been rolled back. It is even more difficult to successfully prosecute those who engage in this fraud. Summarized briefly, this bill provides the following:

First, following the sale of a motor vehicle from one person to another, such vehicle may not be registered or licensed for use in any State unless: the seller discloses on his title certificate the true odometer reading as of the date of sale, and; the application by the new owner of the vehicle for a certificate of title is accompanied by the prior owner's most recent vehicle registration card.

Second, no registration card may be issued in any State unless the application for registration includes the odometer reading on the vehicle as of the date of the application.

Third, the State must take the odometer reading shown on the application and include it as part of the new registration card.

Fourth, the certificate of title issued by the State to the new owner must indicate the odometer reading as of the day of transfer—printed on the title—and the title must be printed in bank note intaglio printing process.

Fifth, in addition, the certificate of title must contain a space for the disclosure of the odometer reading when the car is sold in the future.

Sixth, all auction companies are required to maintain the following records for all cars sold at their auctions:

The name of the seller and the name of the buyer of the motor vehicle; the vehicle identification number of the motor vehicle; and the odometer reading on the date on which the auction company took possession of the motor vehicle.

Seventh, maximum criminal penalties are increased from 1 year to 3 years.

Eighth, maximum civil penalties are increased from $1,000 to $2,000 per violation.

Ninth, the Secretary of Transportation is granted the authority to approve alternative methods of complying with the requirements of the act upon application from a State, if such alternative compliance method is consistent with the purposes of the act.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire text of the bill be printed directly following the conclusion of my remarks and that Senators FORD, RIEGLE, MOYNIHAN, and ZORINSKY be added as original cosponsors.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. ZORINSKY (for himself, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. FORD, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. EXON, and Mr. BOREN):

S.J. Res. 49. Joint resolution to provide emergency credit assistance to the Nation's farmers and ranchers, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

EMERGENCY FARM CREDIT ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, today I am introducing emergency agricultural credit legislation that will provide much needed assistance for many farmers experiencing financial stress due to low farm income, high-interest rates, and declining farmland values.

The proposal I am offering is fiscally sound. It does not create any new bureaucracies and the responsibilities associated with making this assistance available will be shared with lenders, Federal and State governments, and farmers.

During the past several weeks, I have urged the President and Secretary of Agriculture to use authorities under existing law to address farm credit problems. However, the Office of Management and Budget's response has been to rule out most proposals other than to offer telephone hot lines and various action teams. Those steps are fine but the worst agricultural crisis in half a century requires much more.

INDICATORS OF STRESS IN THE FARM ECONOMY

The threat of foreclosure is the most serious and demoralizing aspect of the current depressed agricultural economy. Although some would say that the media has sensationalized the financial problems of farmers, I believe there is an abundance of evidence proving that our family farm system of agriculture is threatened with extinction by the present credit crisis.

During the last 3 years, over 24,000 farmers with Farmers Home Administration loans have been forced to liquidate their operations due to financial reasons. As a result of overseeing record numbers of farm liquidations since 1981, FmHA now has over 2,200 farms in inventory. Prior to 1981, the number of farms held by FmHA had never exceeded 260. The farms held by FmHA consist of about 488,000 acres having a value of several hundred million dollars.

It should be noted that this unprecedented number of liquidations has occurred during a time when Federal courts greatly limited the number of foreclosure actions the Farmers Home Administration could initiate. FmHA has been working to revise its loan liquidation regulations to comply with court orders. Those revisions will be completed by spring; at that time the number of liquidations can be expected to dramatically escalate.

The General Accounting Office has recently reported to me that 16,000 Farmers Home Administration farm borrowers with outstanding loans of over $3 billion are so far behind on their payments that liquidation appears to be inevitable.

FmHA borrowers are not only farmers experiencing difficulty. The Department of Agriculture estimates that about 18 percent—or 430,000 farmers—have debt to asset ratios that are dangerously high, in excess of 40 percent.

In its 1985 agriculture and credit outlook report, the Farm Credit Administration states that production credit association loan-losses totaled $500 million during the past 2 years. That amount exceeds the combined losses during all the other years in the 50-year history of PCA's. Further, the Farm Credit Administration estimates that over 3 percent of all farm credit system borrowers could be forced out of business during the next 12 to 18 months.

In addition, farmers have lost an unprecedented amount of equity in their operations during the last 4 years—$200 billion in inflation adjusted dollars. Further, the rate of return to equity in farm assets has been negative for the past 4 years. Although farmers have traditionally realized a low rate of return on their investment, prior to the Reagan-Stockman-Block years, 1953 was the last time the rate of return to equity was negative.

The long-term solution to farm credit problems is stronger commodity prices and improved farm income. Those issues will be addressed in the 1985 farm bill. However, unless immediate action is taken to provide emergency credit relief, thousands of farmers will be forced out of business before the 1985 crop is even planted.

For that reason, I have developed this emergency credit assistance proposal that will enable farmers to plant a crop this spring and restructure their debt to make them financially sound in future years.

FAILURE TO TAKE ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION NECESSITATES LEGISLATION

As I have indicated, the administration's response to recommendations that discretionary authorities be used to provide immediate credit relief has been inadequate. Because appropriate administrative actions have not been taken, the bill I have developed requires the administration to begin using certain administrative authorities.

Under this legislation, the Farmers Home Administration would be required to take immediate action to hire additional personnel on a temporary basis to process and service loans; reduce the interest rate on direct loans; and eliminate unnecessary administrative requirements that have discouraged participation in the Debt Set-aside program and the Loan Guarantee Program. In addition, the legislation requires FmHA to act within 15 days on requests from lenders to be designated as approved lenders—a step that will expedite the processing of loan guarantee applications.

Further, this legislation establishes a special task force to study agricultural credit problems and make recommendations on what steps can be taken to provide long-term solutions.

The Senate called for the establishment of such a task force on May 2, 1984, when Senate Resolution 287 was approved. Under that proposal, the task force would have completed its work by January 1, 1985. It is unfortunate that we must now address agricultural credit problems without the benefit of the task force's recommendations.

The many problems surrounding farm credit are complex and serious, and are related to other aspects of the national economy. Federal farm credit programs cannot address the weaknesses in the overall economy caused by bankrupt fiscal policies that result in huge budget deficits, but they must be adjusted to reflect the credit problems for farmers stemming from these policy failures.

A careful, unbiased examination of our Nation's agricultural credit industry and Federal agricultural credit policies will assist the administration and Congress in developing long-term legislative remedies.

NEW AUTHORITIES NEEDED

In addition to requiring the administration to use the discretionary authorities I have mentioned, the legislation I am introducing would provide several new and expanded authorities. Those provisions would:

Provide $2.35 billion in additional loan guarantee authority for the Farmers Home Administration;

Authorize the Farmers Home Administration to provide $200 million in matching funds to States that implement a program to buy down the interest rate on loans made by commercial or cooperative lenders;

Authorize transition assistance for certain Farmers Home Administration borrowers to ease the hardship resulting from insolvency;

Require the Farm Credit Administration to study the feasibility of obtaining insurance to protect the financial integrity of farm credit system institutions and thereby protect farm credit system borrowers and investors; and Direct Federal bank regulators to exercise caution and restraint in adversely classifying agricultural loans.

Without the type of credit assistance I have outlined, thousands of farmers will be faced with financial ruin. Agricultural credit needs cannot be ignored any longer if we are to avoid irreversible injury to our Nation's family farm system of agriculture. Further, unless we act quickly to assist our Nation's farmers, what is not an agricultural credit crisis will quickly develop into an ecomomic disaster for all of rural America.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution, a brief explanation of the legislation, and the text of the cover letter from the report issued by the General Accounting Office be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 49

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this joint resolution may be cited as the "Emergency Farm Credit Assistance Act of 1985".

"(3) the borrower certifies that the released assets or cash realized from the sale of the assets will be used to assist in the transition from farming and ranching and not for other purposes;

"(4) the Secretary determines that the borrower has no reasonable debt-paying ability, considering the assets and income of the borrower at the time of the transaction; and

"(5) the county committee certifies that the borrower has acted in good faith, used due diligence to maintain the security property from loss, and has otherwise fulfilled the covenants incident to the loan to the best of the borrower's ability.

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund established under section 309 of this Act may be used by the Secretary in implementing this section.".

FEDERAL-STATE COOPERATIVE INTEREST BUY-DOWN PROGRAM

SEC. 103. Effective for the period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act and ending September 30, 1986, the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section 350 as follows:

"FEDERAL-STATE COOPERATIVE INTEREST BUY-DOWN PROGRAM

"SEC. 350. (a) To assist farmers and ranchers whose debts are restructured by commercial or cooperative lenders, the Secretary may make grants to States for use in buying down the interest rates charged by such lenders.

"(1) be used to provide interest reduction payments on loans secured by real estate or other assets made to restructure debts;

"(2) provide for interest reduction agreements of not less than three years; and

"(3) except as provided in subsection (d), be administered by States that provide equal matching funds for interest reduction payments.

"(c) The Secretary shall provide, and the State may provide, for the recapture of any assistance provided under this section from the assisted borrower or such borrower's heirs upon the disposition of, or other transfer of title or ownership to, the real estate or other assets. The amount to be recaptured shall be secured by a lien on the real estate or other assets.

"(d) The Secretary shall make grants for interest reduction payments under this section without requiring that a State provide equal matching funds whenever the Secretary determines that it would not be practicable for such State to provide matching funds.

"(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund established under section 309 of this Act may be used by the Secretary in implementing this section.

"(f) The total amount of funds used by the Secretary in making grants under this section shall not exceed $200,000,000.".

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION FARM DEBT RESTRUCTURING PROGRAM

SEC. 104. The Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section 349 as follows:

"Implementation of the Debt Adjustment Program and the Program for Special Set-Asides of Farmer Program Indebtedness

"SEC. 349. Notwithstanding any other provision of law—

"(a) In implementing the debt adjustment program established under section 339 of this title on October 19, 1984, the Secretary—

"(1) shall permit lenders to qualify for a loan guarantee under the program without requiring that lenders cancel any portion of the total principal or interest outstanding on the existing indebtedness owed by the borrower;

"(2) shall provide that, for the purposes of the program, a cash flow that reflects a balance available of 100 per centum of the amount needed to pay all the year's debt due, including anticipated tax liability, will be considered a positive cash flow; and

"(3) shall make guarantees available for up to 90 per centum of a loan for an amount not in excess of the outstanding principal and interest owed on the existing indebtedness being adjusted under the program.

"(b) In implementing the program for special set-asides of a portion of the indebtedness under Farmers Home Administration farmer program loans established under section 339 of this title on October 19, 1984, the Secretary shall provide that, for the purposes of the program if a farm and home plan for the typical year shows a balance available of 100 per centum of the amount needed to pay all the year's debts due, including tax liability, the borrower will be considered to have a positive cash flow projection.".

SPECIAL REDUCED INTEREST RATES ON FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION FARM OWNERSHIP AND OPERATING DIRECT LOANS

SEC. 105. (a) Effective for the period beginning October 1, 1984, and ending September 30, 1986, section 307(a)(2) of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act is amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a colon and inserting the following:

"Provided, That where joint financial assistance is being provided by commercial or cooperative lenders, such interest rates on insured loans shall not exceed one-half of the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity comparable to the average maturities of such loans, plus not to exceed 1 per centum, as determined by the Secretary, and adjusted to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum.".

(b) Effective for the period beginning October 1, 1984, and ending September 30, 1986, section 316(a)(1) of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act is amended by changing the period at the end of the second sentence to a colon and inserting the following:

"Provided, That where joint financial assistance is being provided by commercial or cooperative lenders, the interest rates on such loans, except for guaranteed loans and loans as provided in paragraph (3), shall not exceed one-half of the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity comparable to the average maturities of such loans, plus an additional charge not to exceed 1 per centum as determined by the Secretary, which charge shall be deposited in the Rural Development Fund or the Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund, as appropriate and adjusted to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum.".

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE PROCESSING OF APPLICATIONS FOR FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION LOANS

SEC. 106. (a)(1) Congress finds that—

(A) persistently low farm income (due in part to weak export demand), high interest rates, and declining farmland values have created severe financial stress for many farmers;

(B) many financially stressed farmers have turned to the Farmers Home Administration for assistance (including insured loans, loan guarantees, deferral of loan payments, and restructuring of debt) in coping with their credit-related problems; and

(C) it is essential for the national welfare that farmers' requests to the Farmers Home Administration for assistance be processed as expeditiously as possible, especially in light of the need of many farmers to resolve their credit problems in a timely manner to be able to plant and cultivate the 1985 crops.

(2) The Secretary of Agriculture shall immediately take steps—using authorities of law provided to the Secretary, including the Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund and the employment procedures used in connection with the emergency disaster loan program—to make personnel and other resources of the Department of Agriculture available to the Farmers Home Administration sufficient to enable to Farmers Home Administration to process applications from farmers for assistance expeditiously and in a timely manner with respect to farm operations relating to the planting and cultivation of the 1985 crops.

(b) Subsection (h) of section 309 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act is amended by—

(1) designating the existing text thereof as paragraph (1); and

(2) inserting at the end thereof a new paragraph (2) as follows:

"(2) In implementing the approved lender program established under section 339 of this Act on May 4, 1984, the Secretary shall ensure that each request of a lending institution for designation as an approved lender under the program be reviewed, and a decision made on the application, within fifteen days after the lending institution has submitted a completed application to the Farmers Home Administration.".

REGULATIONS

SEC. 107. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Agriculture shall issue or amend regulations to implement the provisions of this title as soon as practicable, but not later than fifteen days after the date of enactment of this title.

TITLE II—TASK FORCE ON AGRICULTURAL CREDIT

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 201. This title may be cited as the "Agricultural Credit Task Force Act of 1985".

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 202. (a) Congress finds that—

(1) agriculture is the Nation's most basic industry, and its associated production, processing, and marketing sectors, together, provide more jobs than any other single industry;

(2) United States agriculture is the world's most productive and the world's largest exporter;

(3) United States agricultural producers are the basic element in the food and fiber system and their ability to make a profit and meet their financial obligations is critical to their remaining in business;

(4) technological developments have greatly increased the capital requirements of agricultural production;

(5) agricultural-related debt has risen from approximately $50,000,000,000 in 1970 to approximately $215,000,000,000 in 1984;

(6) a general decline in the financial condition of producers, as evidenced by increases in the average debt-to-asset ratio and debt-to-equity ratio, threatens the ability of producers to obtain the credit needed to continue their operations;

(7) it is essential that producers be able to obtain adequate credit at interest rates conducive to debt servicing and profit making; and

(8) the foundation of the Nation's agricultural system will be adversely affected if producers are unable to obtain a return on their investment that enables them to service their debt and continue their operations

(b) It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to take such steps as may be necessary to enable United States agricultural producers to obtain adequate credit at interest rates conducive to debt servicing and profit making so as to ensure that the Nation has an adequate and dependable supply of food and fiber at reasonable prices.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGRICULTURAL CREDIT TASK FORCE

SEC. 203. (a) There is established a National Task Force on Agricultural Credit to conduct a study of the credit problems confronting United States agricultural producers and related businesses.

(b)(1) The Task Force shall be composed of fifteen persons appointed or designated by the President and selected as follows:

(A) the President shall select five members; and

(B) the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Majority Leader of the Senate shall each select five members.

(2) In selecting persons as members of the Task Force, the President, the Speaker, and the Majority leader shall endeavor to ensure that the Task Force has a balanced membership representing all major functions in agriculture, such as farmers, suppliers, marketers, and lenders.

(c) A vacancy in the Task Force shall be filled in the manner in which the original appointment was made.

(d) The Task Force shall elect a chairman from among the members of the Task Force.

(e) The Task Force shall meet at the call of the chairman or a majority of the Task Force.

CONDUCT OF STUDY

SEC. 204. The Task Force shall—

(1) identify and describe the components of the existing agricultural credit system;

(2) identify and describe the credit needs of agricultural producers and related businesses; and

(3) evaluate the ability of the existing agricultural credit system to meet the credit needs of agricultural producers.

SEC. 205. (a) On the basis of its study, the Task Force shall make findings and develop recommendations for consideration by the President and Congress with respect to the agriculture-related credit policies, programs, and practices of the United States, and the manner in which such policies, programs, and practices can be improved to ensure that United States agricultural producers obtain adequate credit at interest rates conducive to debt servicing and profit making.

(b) The Task Force shall submit to the President and Congress—

(1) such interim reports on its work as may be requested by the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture or the chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry; and

(2) a report containing the final results of its study and recommendations therefrom by September 1, 1985.

ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 206. (a) The heads of Executive agencies, the General Accounting Office, and the Congressional Budget Office shall, to the extent permitted by law, provide the Task Force such information as it may require in carrying out its duties and function.

(b) Members of the Task Force shall serve without any additional compensation for work on the Task Force. However, members appointed from among private citizens of the United States may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law for persons serving intermittently in the government service under sections 5701 through 5707 of title 5, United States Code.

(c) Upon request of the Task Force, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration shall furnish the Task Force with such personnel and support services as are necessary to assist the Task Force in carrying out its duties and functions.

(d) Upon request of the Task Force, the heads of other Executive agencies and the General Accounting Office are each authorized to furnish the Task Force with such personnel and support services as the head of the agency or office and the chairman of the Task Force agree are necessary to assist the Task Force in carrying out its duties and functions.

(e) The Task Force shall not be required to pay or reimburse any agency or office for personnel and support services provided under this section.

TERMINATION

SEC. 207. The Task Force shall terminate sixty days after the transmission of its final report to the President and Congress.

TITLE III—RESTRAINT IN ADVERSELY CLASSIFYING AGRICULTURAL LOANS; PROTECTION OF FARM CREDIT SYSTEM BORROWER CAPITAL

CAUTION AND RESTRAINT IN ADVERSELY CLASSIFYING LOANS MADE TO FARMERS AND RANCHERS

SEC. 301. (a) Congress finds that—

(1) high agricultural production costs, low prices for some commodities, and declining farmland values have combined to greatly reduce the income of many agricultural producers and to subject these producers, through no fault of their own, to severe economic hardship and, in many cases, to temporarily impair the ability of such producers to meet loan repayment schedules in a timely fashion;

(2) a policy of adverse classification of agricultural loans—that is, designating such loans as problem loans—by Federal bank examiners under these circumstances could trigger a wave of farm foreclosures and similar actions that would depress land values and the value of agricutural facilities and equipment; and

(3) liquidations of agricultural assets on a broad scale would have a devastating effect on farmers and the banking industry, and on rural United States in general.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, to guard against improper and untimely liquidations of agricultural assets, the Federal bank regulatory agencies shall ensure that examiners, in carrying out their duties, exercise caution and restraint in making adverse classifications with respect to agricultural loans. Examiners shall give due consideration not only to the current cash flow of agricultural borrowers under financial stress, but also to factors such as loan collateral and ultimate repayment ability. Futher, regulatory agencies shall continue this policy for so long as the condition of the agricultural economy and the effects of natural disasters temporarily impair the ability of agricultural borrowers to meet scheduled loan repayments.

(c) Not later than ninety days after the enactment of this title, the Chairmen of the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Chairmen of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve Board shall report to Congress on the actions they have taken to carry out this section.

PROTECTION OF FARM CREDIT SYSTEM BORROWER CAPITAL

SEC. 302. (a) The Farm Credit Administration shall conduct a study regarding the need for establishment of a fund to be used to insure System institutions against losses on loans or for any other purpose that would assist in stabilizing the financial conditions of the Farm Credit System and provide for the protection of borrower capital. In conducting the study, the Farm Credit Administration shall consider the advisability of using the revolving funds provided for in section 4.1 of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 to provide start-up capital for any insurance fund and estimate the amount and level of future assessments for System institutions that would be necessary to ensure the long-term liquidity of such an insurance fund.

(b) The Farm Credit Administration shall submit a report containing the results of the study required by this section to the House Committee on Agriculture and the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry not later than one hundred and eighty days after the enactment of this title.

EXPLANATION OF SENATOR ZORINSKY'S EMERGENCY AGRICULTURAL CREDIT ASSISTANCE PROPOSAL

TITLE I

Emergency Farm Credit Assistance

Additional Farmers Home Administration Loan Guarantee Authority.—The legislation authorizes $2.35 billion in loan guarantee authority in addition to the $650 million already available for fiscal year 1985.

Loan guarantees result in Federal expenditures only when a borrower—whose loan has been guaranteed up to 90 percent of the principal amount—is unable to meet his obligations. The lender and the Government share in the loss. Historically, the loss rate has been about 5.5 percent on Farmers Home Administration loan guarantees. Assuming that loss rate, the cost of this provision will be less than $130 million, realized over several years.

Transition assistance for certain Farmers Home Administration borrowers.—The legislation authorizes the Farmers Home Administration to release to certain borrowers up to $10,000 (current market value) in assets used as security for a loan. The assistance is directed to borrowers who have a negative net worth and who are faced with imminent foreclosure or bankruptcy.

The proposal is designed to allow qualified borrowers to keep or liquidate enough assets so that the borrower will have $10,000 in cash or assets with which to assist in a transition out of farming. The borrower, in consideration for his transition assistance, would convey the remainder of his property to the Government or conduct a sale of the property.

The program would save the Government the legal fees and administrative problems associated with foreclosure or bankruptcy proceedings. In addition, the problems of abandonment would be reduced and the Government would likely recover more of the principal owed if a farmer had some incentive to conduct a sale of his property and maintain the property until it is liquidated and the proceeds applied against his loan.

Federal/State interest buy-down.—The legislation authorizes the Farmers Home Administration to use the resources of the Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund to provide $200 million in matching funds to States that implement a program to buy down the interest rate on loans made by commercial or cooperative lenders. The legislation requires the Secretary of Agriculture to make exceptions and allow Federal funds to be used to buy down interest rates in cases where it is not practicable for States to provide matching funds.

Under the legislation, the interest buy-down would apply to at least the first three years of loans made for the purpose of restructuring a borrower's debts. The Federal interest subsidy would be recaptured when the land or other asset is sold or the title is otherwise transferred. The States would also have the option to recapture the interest subsidy.

It is estimated that this program would allow a 5 percent interest buy-down on $3.5 billion in principal.

Improvements in the Farmers Home Administration Farm Debt Restructuring Program

Improvements in the loan guarantee program.—The legislation eliminates the existing administrative requirements that lenders must write off part of the principal or interest to obtain a loan guarantee. Under this provision, lenders could voluntarily write off principal or interest if that was necessary to ensure repayment ability.

Modification of cash flow requirements.—The legislation modifies the Farmers Home Administration existing regulations that require borrowers—as a condition of eligibility for the loan deferral or the debt set-aside program—to show that they have 110 percent of the cash flow needed to meet their obligations. The legislation lowers the cash flow requirement to 100 percent of borrower debt obligations.

Interest rate reduction on direct loans.—The legislation reduces the interest rate on Farmers Home Administration direct loans to one-half the Treasury's cost of borrowing on 50 percent of the direct loan funds available for fiscal years 1985 and 1986. The provision will be applied retroactively for loans already approved.

Borrowers may use these low-interest loan funds in conjunction with loans from commercial or cooperative lenders. The blend of commercial or cooperative credit with Farmers Home Administration credit would effectively reduce the amount of interest a borrower must pay to obtain credit.

Additional personnel for loan processing.—The legislation directs the Secretary of Agriculture to use existing authorities to hire additional personnel to process Farmers Home Administration farm loan applications.

Improvements in the approved lender program.—The legislation requires the Farmers Home Administration to act on the request of a lender for designation as an approved lender within 15 days after the lender has submitted a completed application.

Regulations.—The legislation requires the Secretary of Agriculture to issue regulations implementing this title as soon as practicable, but not later than 15 days after enactment.

TITLE II

Agricultural credit task force.—The legislation establishes a special task force to study agricultural credit problems and make recommendations on what steps can be taken to provide long-term solutions. Under the legislation, the task force must complete its final report by September 1, 1985.

Such a task force was called for in Senate Resolution 287, which was approved on May 2, 1984.

TITLE III

Classification of loans by Federal bank regulators.—The legislation directs Federal bank regulators to exercise caution and restraint in adversely classifying agricultural loans. The legislation requires the specified banking regulators to report to Congress within 90 days of enactment on the actions they have taken to carry out these provisions.

Protection of Farm Credit System borrower capital.—The legislation requires the Farm Credit Administration to study the feasibility of obtaining insurance that will effectively protect Farm Credit System borrower stock. Under the legislation, the study must be completed within 180 days.

Farm Credit System borrowers are required to invest capital, in the form of stock, in the lending institution from which they obtain a loan. In the event of financial problems, the stock or "risk capital" might be partially or entirely lost as was the case when several production credit associations began liquidation proceedings during the past year.

Re B-217648.

Subject: Information on Delinquent Borrowers in Farmers Home Administration Major Farmer Loan Programs (GAO/RCED-85-71).

Hon. EDWARD ZORINSKY,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR ZORINSKY: On November 1, 1984, your staff asked whether we had developed any information on delinquent Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) borrowers as part of our ongoing review of FmHA's management of farm property. Specifically, your staff was interested in the number of and length of time borrowers were delinquent in FmHA's five major farmer loan programs: farm ownership, operating, economic emergency, emergency disaster, and soil and water.

On November 20, 1984, we provided your staff with an oral briefing on the information we had developed on delinquent FmHA borrowers. At that time your staff stated that the information presented was very useful and requested that we provide you with a brief written explanation of the methodology used to obtain the information and any documentation, such as data tabulations, that showed the results of our work. The following information summarizes the data we tabulated on FmHA delinquent borrowers.

As of June 30, 1984, there were 267,252 active FmHA borrowers with one or more of the major farmer program loans. Of these active borrowers, 94,035 or about 35 percent were delinquent.

These 94,035 borrowers were about $5.4 billion delinquent on scheduled payments (principal and interest) for loans representing over $14 billion in unpaid outstanding principal.

Of these delinquent borrowers, 16,093 or 17 percent, were delinquent on at least one FmHA farm loan for over 4 years. These over 4 year delinquent borrowers have a net delinquent amount of over $2 billion in payments for loans representing over $3 billion in unpaid outstanding principal.

We are providing you with three enclosures which provide details on this information. The first enclosure provides data on the status of delinquent borrowers for the five farmer loan programs as of June 30, 1984. The information was obtained by analyzing FmHA's computerized Master Borrower File. This file is used by FmHA to generate FmHA Report 616 on the status of active delinquent borrowers in all FmHA loan programs. Because of variances in FmHA and our programming and format methodology, there are some minor number differences (as explained in the enclosure) between our data and FmHA loan and borrower data.

The second enclosure presents historical FmHA data on delinquent borrowers for the five farmer loan programs over a 10 year period, 1975 through 1984. This data was obtained directly from FmHA Report 616. The third enclosure presents data on the number of FmHA borrowers with farm ownership loans that were delinquent over 4 years and the number of FmHA borrowers with farm ownership loans whose farm property was acquired by FmHA during the period 1975 through 1983. Data on delinquent borrowers was obtained from FmHA Report 616 and data on borrowers whose farm properties were acquired by FmHA was obtained from FmHA Report 592. However, no valid, direct correlation or trend analysis can be made between the length of time a borrower is delinquent and FmHA's acquisition of the property as explained in the enclosure.

Each enclosure contains a brief explanation of the table or graph presented, the methodology used to develop the information, and an explanation of any data limitations.

Although we did not test the validity of the FmHA data used in our tabulations, we did provide copies of our work to appropriate FmHA officials and they concurred that it was valid and accurate.

If you have any additional questions or if we can be of any further assistance on this issue, please feel free to contact Jim Wells of my staff on 475-4880.

Sincerely yours,

RALPH W. PERLONE,
(For J. Dexter Peach, Director).

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. KERRY, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. INOUYE, and Mr. BRADLEY):

S.J. Res. 50. Joint resolution to designate the week of April 1, 1985, through April 7, 1985, as "World Health Week," and to designate April 7, 1985, as "World Health Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WORLD HEALTH WEEK AND WORLD HEALTH DAY

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing for myself, Senator KENNEDY, Senator JOHNSTON, Senator MATSUNAGA, Senator KERRY, Senator BUMPERS, Senator INOUYE, and Senator BRADLEY, Senate Joint Resolution 50, designating April 1, 1985, as "World Health Week" and April 7, 1985 as "World Health Day".

In the 98th Congress the Senate introduced and passed S.J. Res. 137, calling for April 7, 1984 as "World Health Day". However, to our disappointment the resolution was not considered by the House of Representatives. This year the American Association for World Health has requested that we sponsor the week beginning April 1, 1985, as "World Health Week" culminating with "World Health Day" on April 7, 1985.

April 7, is celebrated as "World Health Day" around the world to promote better health care for all people and to draw attention to the World Health Organization's goal of health for all by the year 2000. Good health is essential for all people to be able to lead socially and economically productive lives.

Mr. President, given the quality of life enjoyed by many in this country, the call for a healthy world embodied in this resolution might easily be taken for granted. However, the plight of those in Sub-Sahara Africa has drawn our attention back to those in need of life's basic necessities. In Ethiopia alone, it is estimated that the lives of more than 5 million people are endangered by drought and famine. The interplay between inadequate nutrition, shelter and health is well established. Yet the delivery of a few essential services could improve the health status of millions all over the globe. The objectives are simple, the minimum requirement of safe water and adequate sanitary facilities; immunization against diptheria, pertussis, tetanus, poliomyelitis, measles, mumps, rubella, and tuberculosis; local health care within 1 hour's travel; and the availability of trained health practitioners for childbirth, perinatal care, and the care of children throughout infancy.

The World Health Organization continues to direct international health activities. The constant surveillance, control, and eradication of disease; the collection, dissemination, and exchange of health data; and collaborative research are all directed and supported by the World Health Organization. In this country, the American Association for World Health serves to heighten our awareness of the issues surrounding world health needs and works with the World Health Organization to make our participation in their efforts worthwhile. In declaring the week of April 1, 1985, through April 7, 1985, as "World Health Week," and April 7, 1985, as "World Health Day," it is my hope that we will increase our awareness of what must be undertaken to make ourselves and all people in the world healthier. Good health does not just happen. To contribute to making health for all a reality by the year 2000, I urge all my colleagues to join with me in cosponsoring this resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 50

Whereas the health of a nation depends upon the health of its people;

Whereas improvement of the health of the people of our Nation contributes to world health, and world health contributes to the health of our Nation—a principle enunciated in the Constitution of the World Health Organization and accepted by the United States;

Whereas the United States is an active member of the World Health Organization and has both benefited from and contributed to the achievements of the organization;

Whereas the countries of the world, acting through the World Health Organization, are committed to the goal of "Health for All by the Year 2000";

Whereas primary health care is recognized as a key to the attainment of "Health for All by the Year 2000";

Whereas health education and health awareness, prevention, and treatment of common diseases and illnesses, basic sanitation, and adequate nutrition are essential elements of primary health care;

Whereas the World Health Organization has established April 7 of each year as World Health Day to call attention to what individuals and governments can do to further the health of human beings everywhere, and the American Association of World Health has sponsored and assisted in this endeavor; and

Whereas it has been the custom for the President to call attention to World Health Day each year in the form of a public message: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of April 1, 1985, through April 7, 1985, is designated as "World Health Week" and April 7, 1985, is designated as "World Health Day" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.●

By Mr. HATCH (for himself and Mr. DENTON):

S.J. Res. 51. Joint resolution to designate the week beginning November 24, 1985, as "National Adoption Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL ADOPTION WEEK

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it is again my privilege to sponsor a Senate joint resolution proclaiming Thanksgiving week as National Adoption Week. Last year was the first year we were successful in this resolution becoming public law. It is my hope to again achieve that goal.

During the past few years, a growing number of Americans have felt a need to reestablish our traditional values, especially family values. The official designation of Thanksgiving week as National Family Week is an example of this encouraging trend. National Adoption Week recognizes that adoption is an important part of the life and love of many American families, and thus, it seems fitting for it to coincide with National Family Week.

There are many children in this country who need and desperately long for a permanent home with a family. In America today, there are estimated to be 50,000 adoptable children who are legally free for adoption. These children, however, remain in foster care and institutions due to various public and private barriers. There also remains a lack of awareness by prospective parents who don't know that these children are available. We must do more to remove the barriers to place these children into permanent homes.

The majority of the children who are legally free for adoption have "special needs." They may have physical, emotional, or mental handicaps, or they may be children who have already reached school age. They may be children from various ethnic backgrounds. They may be children with brothers and sisters. What they all share in common is a fundamental need for a permanent, secure and loving home.

This is why this Joint Resolution is so important. It is not just another commemorative Joint Resolution. It gives clear meaning to the congressional intent in support of encouraging and supporting fair adoption practices.

As part of National Family Week, adoption has been honored over the past 10 years. The North American Council on Adoptable Children [NACAC] has been actively involved in providing information highlighting this week's activities. Further, the National Committee for Adoption has also sponsored activities during this week along with the Department of Health and Human Services, under the direction of Assistant Secretary Dorcas Hardy. Assistant Secretary Hardy is an inspiration in working to gain the adoption of children with special needs. I am including with this statement an article written by Assistant Secretary Hardy and urge my colleagues to read it carefully. It has a vital message that can be summed up in the opening quote of the article:

There are only two bequests we can give our families, one of them is roots, the other is wings. Families can help provide both the security of roots and the inspiration of wings.—Henry Ward Beecher

Let us focus attention on adoption and commend those public and private institutions working to find permanent homes for all adoptable children. Let us join in a celebration for families who have united through adoption. Children grow better in families. I urge you to join Senator DENTON and I in sponsoring and enacting this Joint Resolution. I ask unanimous consent that the complete text of the Joint Resolution, as well as the article entitled "Adoption of Children with Special Needs, A National Perspective," be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 51

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Whereas the week of November 24 has been commemorated as National Adoption Week for the past ten years;

Whereas we in Congress recognize the essential value of belonging to a secure, loving permanent family as every child's basic right;

Whereas approximately 50,000 children who have special needs—school age, in sibling groups, members of minorities or children with physical, mental and emotional handicaps—are now in foster care or institutions financed at public expense and are legally free for adoption;

Whereas the adoption by capable parents of these institutionalized or foster care children into permanent, adoptive homes would insure the opportunity for their continued happiness and long-range well-being;

Whereas public and private barriers inhibiting the placement of these special needs children must be reviewed and removed where possible to assure these children's adoption;

Whereas the public and prospective parents must be informed of the availability of adoptable children;

Whereas a variety of media, agencies, adoptive parent and advocacy groups, civic and church groups, businesses and industries will feature publicity and information to heighten community awareness of the crucial needs of waiting children; and

ADOPTION OF CHILDREN WITH SPECIAL NEEDS—A NATIONAL PERSPECTIVE

(By Dorcas R. Hardy, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services)

There are only two bequests we can give our families, one of them is roots, the other is wings. Families can help to provide both the security of roots and the inspiration of wings.—Henry Ward Beecher

One of the most encouraging child welfare trends in recent years is the adoption of so-called "unadoptable" children by people who were once totally overlooked as prospective parents. Today, all over the country, children with special needs—children who are older, handicapped, in sibling groups, or members of minorities—are being moved out of foster care into lifetime homes. The new adoptive parents are as diverse as the children—older couples with adult biological children, single men and women, handicapped parents, foster parents, and individuals or couples who may not have much money or many possessions, but who do have love, flexibility, and the desire to reach out to one or more children who need them. These new style families provide both roots, to give the security of belonging, and wings, to help children with special needs to reach their fullest potential.

These families show that in the last 15 years, the focus of adoption has shifted from the healthy, white infant and the financially secure, "perfect" family to the universe of real people with a great variety of characteristics. Public policies have also shifted, due in part to two concurrent trends: First, fewer infants were available for adoptions, and second, more and more children were going into foster care—not as a temporary haven as intended, but often to spend their childhoods in a succession of foster homes. By the late 1970s, more than 500,000 children were in the foster care system. The actual and potential damage to children, and thereby to society, was apparent, as was the increasing drain on public resources. The public reacted with a clear message: These are our children, they belong in families, we have responsibility for them. Policymakers at the state and federal levels responded.

LEGISLATIVE REFORM

One basic philosophy began to emerge: permanency for children, ideally with their birth parents, if this is possible, and if not, then with adoptive parents. Urged by prospective adoptive parents and child welfare organizations, much of the early reform centered on subsidized adoptions. Starting in New York in 1968, states began to pass adoption subsidy laws. In 1974, the Children's Bureau provided a grant to the Child Welfare League of America to develop a Model State Subsidized Adoption Act. Today, every state, the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands have such a law, except Hawaii, where adoption subsidies are handled administratively. State laws vary, but most subsidies cover the cost of maintenance as well as medical and other special services needed by the child. Subsidies helped families, especially foster families, overcome the tremendous financial hurdle often associated with a special-needs child and offered a savings to states, because subsidized adoptions are cheaper than foster care. The movement culminated when Congress, with strong bipartisan support, passed the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980. This Act, which made permanency for children our national policy and provided for federal participation in adoption subsidies, is described below.

Significant progress has been made in recent years, but there are still more than 250,000 children in foster care, 36,000 special-needs children who are legally free for adoption, and thousands more for whom adoption is the plan of choice. Our job today is to translate the ideal of permanency into reality for these children. In fiscal year 1983, at the federal government level, we launched a national effort to help achieve this goal.

NATIONAL SPECIAL NEEDS ADOPTION INITIATIVE

As part of our National Special Needs Adoption Initiative, we are working with states and local communities to promote the adoption of special-needs youngsters. We are asking the public and private sectors to focus on increasing public awareness of special-needs children who are in foster homes, group homes, and institutions; on recruiting prospective adoptive parents, with an emphasis on minority parents; on training adoption workers in current adoption practices and policies; on encouraging review and analysis of state adoption laws; on addressing national issues such as adoptions across state lines; and on opening avenues of additional support for meeting the needs of waiting children.

Two laws define my Department's responsibilities in special needs Adoptions: Title II, Adoption Opportunities, which was part of the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment and Adoption Reform Act of 1978 (PL 95-266), and the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980 (PL 96-272).

Title II: Adoption Opportunities

Title II, passed in 1978, was the first federal legislation specifically dealing with adoption. Title II mandated a number of activities to eliminate barriers to the adoption of special-needs children. For example, Title II funds helped develop a Model State Adoption Act, a 50-hour curriculum that has been used to train 300 trainers selected by the states, and an approach to help agencies and adoptive parents prepare prospective adoptive parents. Title II funds also helped expand the number of local, state, and regional adoption exchanges to assist agencies in promoting waiting children across jurisdictional lines. One of the most far-reaching programs mandated by Title II is a National Adoption Exchange, currently operated by the Adoption Center of Delaware Valley, which has established a computerized system and registered more than 900 children and 1,100 families.

The Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980

Title II activities prepared the way for the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980 (PL 96-272). This Act amended Title IV of the Social Security Act and created a new Title IV-E, Federal Payments for Foster Care and Adoption Assistance. This landmark legislation was designed to reduce the number of children going into foster care, to keep children from drifting in foster care for long periods, and to curb the rising costs of care. States, in order to receive their maximum share of foster care maintenance and service funds, must determine the number of children in care, develop a case plan and track every child, establish a process for periodic case review to determine whether continued foster care is necessary, and provide procedural safeguards for foster children and their parents to protect their rights, with oversight by the courts.

Before PL 96-272, the federal focus had been on reimbursement for foster care only, a disincentive to adoption because state and local funds paid for subsidized adoptions. Prior to the passage of the law, the state would lose the federal foster care match when a child was placed into a subsidized adoption. Today, the federal government will pay a percentage of the cost of adoption subsidies; the state must create an adoption assistance program in accordance with the Social Security Act in order to continue to participate in the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program. Federal reimbursement is available for subsidies paid to special-needs children, as defined by the state, who are eligible for AFDC or Supplemental Security Income (SSI). We urge states, as they revise their adoption laws and administrative procedures to comply with PL 96-272, to continue or broaden eligibility standards of their own state subsidy program in order to also cover special-needs children who are not eligible for AFDC or SSI.

We also urge states to define special needs broadly, as permitted by the federal law, to cover not only mentally or physically handicapped children, but also the many children with other characteristics that may be impediments to adoption. Some states, for example, do not define age or minority status as a special need. Many older or minority children miss opportunities for adoption because they do not fit the definition set by the state and are thus not eligible for assistance.

Children eligible for federal adoption assistance payments are also eligible for Medicaid. Previously, loss of Medicaid eligibility when a child was adopted had been a tremendous barrier to adoption, especially for children with severely handicapping conditions. The subsidy and the Medicaid benefits follow the child should the adoptive family move into another state. The issues surrounding such moves are among those being addressed by a Model Interstate Adoption Assistance Compact being developed in cooperation with the American Public Welfare Association (APWA). Because health care providers often will not honor out-of-state Medicaid cards, this poses a major problem that we are working with the Health Care Financing Administration (HCFA) to resolve.

Federal reimbursement for Title IV-E Adoption Assistance was not widely claimed by the states by the end of fiscal year 1982, when compliance became mandatory. In that year, 11 states claimed reimbursement for about 1,300 children. As part of the National Special Needs Adoption Initiative, we are urging states to make fuller use of the Federal Adoption Assistance Program. In fiscal year 1983, 40 states and the District of Columbia served about 4,700 children monthly with federal adoption assistance; 45 states and the District of Columbia have estimated that they would serve almost 11,000 children in fiscal year 1984.

It is too early to assess the impact of Title IV-E on special-needs adoptions. It is not too early, however, to assess the perceived impact of PL 96-272 with its multipronged approach to permanency for children. My office, if fiscal year 1982, funded a child welfare survey in nine states: New York, California, Illinois, Michigan, Florida, Massachusetts, Virginia, Georgia, and Texas. In these states, which represented 43.5% of the children in foster care based on figures from a 1980 Report of the Office of Civil Rights, all but one showed a decline in their foster care population by December 1982. The average decline was 13.6%. The states also reported that adoptions increased since enactment of PL 96-272. Although much of the improvement can probably be attributed to the new law, six of the nine states had passed legislation in the 1970s similar to the intent of PL 96-272 and had already begun the reforms.

Virginia, for example, which instituted permanency planning in 1977, reported a decline in foster care population from 10,827 in that year to 7,085 in 1982—a 34% decrease! Virginia also reported that its use of subsidized adoptions, in addition to providing permanent homes for children, saved the state $213.79 per month for each child placed.

Illinois, another of the states surveyed, has had one of the most aggressive special-needs adoption efforts in the nation for the last few years. Among many activities, Illinois overhauled its law regarding parental terminations and embarked on a massive media campaign under the slogan, "I Want to Be a Son; I Want to Be a Daughter." The effort has brought tremendous returns. In a 15-month period, for example, the state increased special-needs adoptions by 70%, and the number of children in subsidized adoptions went from 212 in 1979 to 493 in 1982.

PRIVATE SECTOR INVOLVEMENT

Many states are finding the media to be an effective partner in special-needs adoptions, especially in recruiting adoptive families. Many newspapers and corporate newsletters throughout the country are featuring waiting children on a regular basis. Nearly 80 television stations are doing weekly features as part of the evening news. I have been pleased to present awards to a number of these stations for their "Wednesday's Child" or "Thursday's Child" features, most of which report a placement rate of more than 80%.

Indeed, in our initiative, we are building on the energy and commitment already being used—or waiting to be tapped—in the media, national and local organizations, parent groups, voluntary agencies, and corporations. In Houston, a young patent attorney recruited 60 corporate attorneys to handle special-needs adoptions, saving families almost $30,000 in legal fees. In Atlanta, a volunteer parent group publishes the state's photo listing book, which is used by state and private agencies to help match prospective parents and waiting children. Two private agencies, Aid to the Adoption of Special Kids (AASK) in California and Downey Side in Massachusetts, cosponsored an interstate conference on special-needs adoptions with private sector backing. My office supported this effort. We are also working with the National Committee for Adoption, which, among many activities, has provided national leadership in promoting adoption benefits among corporations.

We have enlisted organizations such as the Young Lawyers Division of the American Bar Association and the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges as partners in our initiative. And we funded the National Black Child Development Institute to sponsor a special-needs adoption national conference for representatives of major black organizations. We are also working with several organizations to develop a strategy for the placement of Hispanic children. The emphasis on minority children and the recruitment of minority parents is particularly important to the initiative because minority children make up about 46% of all children in foster care.

Within the Office of Human Development Services, the Administration for Children, Youth, and Families (ACYF), which implements the adoption legislation and has the lead in the initiative; the Administration on Developmental Disabilities (ADD); the Administration for Native Americans (ANA); and the President's Committee on Mental Retardation (PCMR) are all coordinating efforts to get special-needs children placed. In July, for example, ADD and ACYF sponsored a special-needs adoption work-shop for representatives of the organizations that make up the Consortium concerned with Developmental Disabilities. In addition, we have allocated $1.9 million of our Human Development Services Coordinated Discretionary Funds Program for innovative adoption demonstrations in both fiscal years 1982 and 1983. Here are just a few examples. The American Indian Law Center in Albuquerque is working to strengthen tribal-state relationships and improve permanency planning for American Indian and Alaska native children. Family Builders of Colorado is providing training on permanency planning to 250 health professionals, social workers, teachers, and others who work with developmentally disabled children. The Illinois Department of Family and Children Services is expanding the One Church/One Child project begun by Father Clements, a black priest and adoptive father in Chicago. Father Clements's idea is that each church will recruit at least one family to adopt at least one child.

We are implementing our special-needs adoption initiative, as well as a broader initiative on strengthening the family, in keeping with the basic philosophy of the Reagan administration. We believe that the well-being of the public is primarily a responsibility of individuals, families, and the communities in which they live. We believe that services are best defined and identified through public or private institutions at the level closest to the problems. We recognize that foster care, and the attendant adoption services, are the responsibility of the states. In our adoption initiatives, we are promoting, building on, and sharing with the nation the public-private partnerships that have made, or can make, a difference in the lives of children who wait for permanent homes.

Whether influencing or implementing public policy around permanency, the changing foster care and adoption scene in America today demands the attention of lay people and professionals in a variety of fields, including psychiatrists, psychologists, family therapists, and other mental health practitioners, not to mention the cadre of social workers, lawyers, judges, court-appointed special advocates, and others who find themselves involved in keeping children out of the child welfare system or moving them quickly into permanent families. And it is the family, whether the biological or adoptive family, that our public policies must undergird.

S.J. Res. 52. Joint resolution to designate the month of April 1985 as "National School Library Month;" to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL SCHOOL LIBRARY MONTH

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President. I rise today to introduce a joint resolution to designate the month of April 1985 as National School Library Month. By this joint resolution, we would recognize an often overlooked institution—the school and university library—that performs a crucial role in American education, fostering an interest in learning which can last throughout a person's life.

All of us have benefited from school libraries. In the critical early years of a child's education, the elementary school library nurtures youthful curiosity and offers the world of books to those just learning to read. Secondary school students use their school libraries to broaden academic and extracurricular interests while they develop research skills. The college library is a center for study and more intensive research, and the postgraduate level, the universities library's extensive collections are the locus of scholarly research. At every level of education, the library is an integral component of the larger educational system.

The first permanent library in the American colonies was a university library, established at Harvard College in 1638. In the 19th century, the American public school movement fostered the growth of school libraries, as well as free public lending libraries.

In 1920, Mr. C.C. Certain of the American Library Association established the Certain standards for school libraries, calling on school libraries to include not just books, but a broad variety of resource materials. This Certain standard has become a hallmark of the modern American school library. Today, the complete library includes collections of magazines, periodicals, tapes, and films, works of art, braille, and other special materials for handicapped readers, and, of course, computers. Computers now allow librarians and students immediate access to information from all over the world.

Today, more than 70,000 elementary and secondary school libraries house more than 530 million volumes. Each school year, students borrow more than 19 million books. These school libraries, moreover, depend on the skills of well-trained librarians. A well-read, well-trained librarian can make such a difference in the lives of young students, instilling a love of books and learning. Recently, eight States, including my own State of New York, have designated special days to recognize school libraries. Now it is fitting that the Congress join these States in honoring libraries.

The special contributions of school libraries—to education, to the American library system, and to the entire Nation—has for too long been overlooked. I suggest April for this recognition to coincide with the annual celebration of National Library Week. This joint resolution, endorsed by the American Library Association and the American Association of School Librarians, honors the unique and incalculable contribution of school libraries to American education. I urge my colleagues to support this joint resolution to designate April 1985 as National School Library Month.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 52

Whereas school libraries serve a critical function in American education and provide an information center for students at all levels of study;

Whereas elementary and secondary school libraries provide young people with their first exposure to books, and can instill a lifelong love of reading;

Whereas school libraries at all educational levels provide a full range of media resources, including audio-visual aids, computers, works of art, and materials for the blind and handicapped;

Whereas school libraries, with their extensive collections, serve as an important link in interdisciplinary education;

Whereas school libraries rely on the dedication and talents of well-trained, well-read librarians and other support staff;

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 14—RELATING TO JOSEF MENGELE

Mr. MOYNIHAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 14

Whereas Josef Mengele was the chief doctor at the Nazi concentration camp of Auschwitz-Birkenau during the Second World War where he personally sent more than four hundred thousand Jews, including close to two hundred thousand children to the gas chambers and conducted unspeakable pseudo-scientific experiments on many of the inmates of Auschwitz; and

Whereas Josef Mengele has lived in freedom since the end of the Second World War, initially in his hometown of Gunzburg, in the American zone of Germany, and thereafter, for the past thirty-five years, in South America; and

Whereas Josef Mengele became a naturalized citizen of Paraguay in 1959, and is believed still to be living there; and

Whereas the Minister of the Interior of Paraguay has promised the members of a delegation sponsored by the International Network of Children of Jewish Holocaust Survivors that the Paraguayan Government would undertake a nationwide investigation to locate Joseph Mengele and allow foreign observers to participate in such investigation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that—

(1) the Government of Paraguay should immediately carry out an investigation to locate and arrest Josef Mengele and extradite him to the Federal Republic of Germany;

(2) the United States should send representatives to Paraguay to observe and participate in such an investigation; and

(3) the United States should take all possible actions to ensure that Josef Mengele is brought to justice.

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to submit a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress that Josef Mengele be brought to justice. The concurrent resolution urges the Government of Paraguay immediately to carry out its investigation into the whereabouts of Josef Mengele, do all in its power to locate and arrest Josef Mengele, and extradite him to the Federal Republic of Germany.

Josef Mengele was the chief doctor at the Nazi concentration camp of Auschwitz-Birkenau during the Second World War where he personally ordered more than 400,000 Jews—including close to 200,000 children—to the gas chambers after, in many cases, conducting barbarous, unspeakable pseudo-scientific experiments on many of them. Despite this vast criminality, Mengele has lived in freedom since the end of the Second World War, and for the past 35 years in South America.

The civilized peoples of the world ought no longer to allow Josef Mengele's crimes to go unpunished, and to allow him to live, untried, in freedom.

On November 22, 1984, the Paraguayan Minister of Interior promised that the Paraguayan Government would undertake a nationwide investigation to ascertain the whereabouts of Josef Mengele. Yet after 3 months, there has been no investigation. The world community, and the United States, must ensure that justice is done. This concurrent resolution puts the U.S. Congress on record that there must be no further delay in bringing Josef Mengele to trial.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 71—AUTHORIZING THE PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS BY THE SENATE PERMANENT SUBCOMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. DOLE (for himself and Mr. BYRD) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. RES. 71

Whereas, in 1971 the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations investigated and held hearings on organized crime and stolen securities;

Whereas, the Department of Justice has requested access to certain papers in the Subcommittee's files from that investigation which may be useful in connection with a criminal proceeding;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by administrative or judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that documents, papers, and records under the control of or in the possession of the Senate are needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Chairman and Ranking Minority Member of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, acting jointly, are authorized to provide to the Department of Justice records of the Subcommittee relating to its investigation of organized crime and stolen securities.

SENATE RESOLUTION 72—RELATING TO A PUBLIC OFFERING OF CONRAIL

Mr. HEINZ (for himself and Mr. SPECTER) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

S. RES. 72

Whereas, Conrail began operations on April 1, 1976; and

Whereas, the United States has invested more than $7 billion since April 1, 1976, in order to sustain Conrail as a financially viable operation; and

Whereas, Conrail has required no federal subsidy during the last four years, has generated increasingly large annual cash reserves, and has been determined by the United States Railway Association to be a 'profitable carrier' as that term is defined in the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981; and

Whereas, it is desirable to return Conrail to the private sector, in keeping with the provisions of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981, now that Conrail has become a profitable entity; and

Whereas, the Secretary of Transportation, in keeping with the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981, has engaged in an exhaustive process to return Conrail to private ownership, and has negotiated the private sale of Conrail to one of three bidders; and

Whereas, the process engaged-in by the Secretary has been remarkable for thoroughness and good-faith, and should go forward in the absence of an acceptable alternative; and

Whereas, the sale of Conrail will provide the purchaser with substantial and significant tax advantages; and

Whereas, the American public, which so heavily subsidized Conrail during the first five years of operations, deserves the first opportunity to purchase Conrail and to benefit from the advantages associated therewith; and

Whereas, a public sale of Conrail stock would give the American people an opportunity to purchase Conrail and to reap the rewards of their $7 billion investment; and

Whereas, the capital markets have improved as a result of railroad deregulation and a public offering of Conrail stock could be accomplished within a reasonable period of time; and

Whereas, a public sale could be structured to accommodate the covenants available in a private sale, including, but not limited to, agreements requiring the owners of Conrail to: conduct Conrail's business substantially as it is being conducted now; make capital expenditures sufficient to protect Conrail's capital plant; refrain from paying dividends unless a minimum cash balance of $500 million would remain; guarantee the maximum level of service economically justifiable; and provide the Federal Government with regular certification of covenant compliance; and

Whereas, a public sale, if successful, would leave Conrail in a strong financial position by giving it access to the deep pockets of the capital markets, promote long-term freight rail-service in the regions served by Conrail, and maximize the return to the United States and its citizens on their investment in Conrail; and

Whereas, a public sale of substantially all of Conrail's common stock could be conducted on a contingent basis, so as not to preclude a subsequent private sale should a public sale fail to realize an amount at least equal to that guaranteed by a private sale: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States:

That is is the sense of the Senate that the Secretary of Transportation of the United States should immediately seek legislation which would—

(1) authorize and require the Secretary of Transportation, as a condition precedent to taking any other action with respect to returning Conrail to the private sector, to first make a contingent public offering of Conrail stock, and use the Secretary's best efforts to ensure the success of that offering; and

(2) in the event that such public offering failed to realize an amount at least equal to the amount heretofore guaranteed by any other purchaser, as evidenced by a letter of intent submitted to the Secretary of Transportation on February 8, 1985, authorize the Secretary of Transportation to designate, in keeping with such terms and conditions as Congress in such legislation shall prescribe, and alternate purchaser of Conrail, provided that such purchase is otherwise in compliance with the law.

STATEMENT

(1) It is the sense of the Senate that the Secretary of Transportation of the United States should immediately seek legislation which would—

(a) authorize and require the Secretary of Transportation, as a condition precedent to taking any other action with respect to returning Conrail to the private sector, to first make a contingent public offering of Conrail stock, and use the Secretary's best efforts to ensure the success of that offering; and

(b) in the event that such public offering failed to realize an amount at least equal to the amount heretofore guaranteed by any other purchaser, as evidenced by a letter of intent submitted to the Secretary of Transportation on February 8, 1985, authorize the Secretary of Transportation to designate, in keeping with such terms and conditions as Congress in such legislation shall prescribe, an alternate purchaser of Conrail, provided that such purchase is otherwise in compliance with the law.

(2) A copy of this resolution shall be forwarded to the Honorable Elizabeth Hanford Dole, the Secretary of Transportation of the United States.

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, at stake in the sale of Conrail is the economic security of the Northeast. The selection of a purchaser will have profound consequences for the Northeast freight transportation system and the hundreds of thousands of people whose livelihood depends upon it. Given the magnitude of the potential consequences associated with the privatization of Conrail, it is not surprising that interest in the sale of Conrail has been keen nationwide.

Throughout the debate over the future of Conrail, everyone has agreed on one major point: the U.S. Government should not be in the business of owning and operating railroads. Conrail should be sold to the private sector as soon as practicable.

Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole may have jeopardized the effort to sell Conrail when she designated the Norfolk-Southern Corp. as her preferred purchaser. Here in Congress, where the sale issue will ultimately be decided, the Secretary's action has met with considerable controversy in both Chambers, and may result in a legislative deadlock. Those of us who favor a return of Conrail to the private sector would find such a stalemate highly undesirable.

The proposal to merge Conrail with Norfolk-Southern is controversial on two counts. First, a Conrail-Norfolk merger could result in a dramatic reduction of northeastern rail competition. Transportation statistics show that a Conrail-Norfolk combination would not only leave 5,557 shipping points bereft of access to competing lines, but would also create a duopoly in the East between Norfolk-Southern and the CSX rail network. Together, Norfolk-Southern and CSX would control 90 percent of all rail originations and terminations in most eastern cities. This duopoly could breed tacit or direct collusion between these giant rail systems, resulting in the creation of a de facto monopoly. In anticipation of possible anticompetitive effects of a Conrail-Norfolk merger, the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice has indicated that it will oppose the proposed merger unless the anticompetitive aspects are remedied before any sale takes place. Regrettably, the approach proposed by the Department of Justice is fraught with pitfalls and unanswered questions which could take a long time to resolve. At present, it is unclear which lines Norfolk-Southern will have to divest, how much they are worth, and to whom they will be sold. These uncertainties tend to frustrate, rather than facilitate, Conrail's return to private ownership.

Second, a Conrail-Norfolk merger could result in major unforeseen employment reductions. Although Norfolk-Southern Chairman Robert B. Claytor has stated his belief that job eliminations on the combined system are not likely to exceed 2,300, he is unable to say so for sure. Conrail officials estimate that the figure will be at least that high for Conrail alone, and independent industry analysts believe that Norfolk-Southern and Conrail combined could lose as many as 10,000 jobs within 5 years. Employee protection is of vital concern in the Conrail sale. No action should be taken in Congress in the absence of sound information on how many jobs will be lost in a Conrail-Norfolk merger.

In 1981, this body passed the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 to denationalize Conrail and restore it to free market conditions. Secretary Dole's proposal to sell Conrail to Norfolk-Southern is unlikely to accomplish that objective. The deleterious effect such a sale would have on the Northeast has virtually guaranteed that the Secretary's proposal will not receive the support of Congress anytime soon. There is more than one way to skin a cat, however, and the Congress would do well to consider as an alternative to the Secretary's plan a public offering of Conrail stock.

Many different kinds of public offerings have been proposed over the past several months, not all of them good. The public offering proposed by Conrail Chairman Stanley Crane, for instance, relies on the use of $300 million in Conrail cash and too much preferred stock, and is actually a leveraged buyout. I favor a public offering which would rely substantially on the sale of common stock and would not employ leverage. I am submitting legislation today that would accomplish that objective.

Mr. President, the measure I submit today affords us a way to get the privatization of Conrail out of the box in which it seems to have gotten stuck. The compromise I propose is presented in the form of a resolution, rather than as a bill, because it is the concept, rather than the details, of the compromise which is important.

The concept is a simple one. My resolution would instruct the Secretary of Transportation to seek Conrail sale legislation which would first, authorize a contingent public offering of Conrail stock before any further action is taken to privatize Conrail, and two, designate an alternate method of sale in the event that the public offering should fail to generate an amount for Conrail at least equal to the amount guaranteed by Norfolk-Southern. If the public offering raises more than the amount pledged by Norfolk-Southern, Conrail would be sold to the American people. If the public offering fails to meet that price, Conrail would be sold in accordance with such terms and conditions as Congress shall prescribe. Either way, Conrail would be returned to the private sector.

A public offering of the type I propose can occur in a reasonably short period of time, accomplish all of the Secretary's policy objectives, and be presented in a way that permits a subsequent private sale should a public sale prove unsuccessful. Best of all, a public offering of Conrail stock would give the American people a chance to vote with their wallets and settle the Conrail debate once and for all.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to give this measure their full consideration and support.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

NATIONAL HEART MONTH

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, in declaring February 1985 as American Heart Month, both the Congress and the President have recognized the need to continue the battle against this Nation's leading killer—heart disease. Over 42 million Americans have one or more form of cardiovascular disease. Almost as many people will die from cardiovascular disease in 1985 as from cancer, accidents, and all other causes of death combined. In 1985, 550,000 individuals will die from heart attacks, and 500,000 individuals will suffer a stroke. The total economic cost of cardiovascular disease this year will reach $72 billion in direct medical expenses and indirect costs such as insurance, disability claims, lost salaries, and rehiring and training.

As alarming as these statistics may seem, there are some positive trends as well. Since 1968, the death rate from coronary heart disease has declined by 33 percent and the death rate from stroke has plummeted by 46 percent. The research efforts by the American Heart Association [ANA], the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute [NHLBI], and by the National Institutes of Health [NIH], have contributed significantly to this remarkable decline in the mortality rate from coronary heart disease and stroke.

However, the scope and magnitude of cardiovascular disease demands that further progress in research, prevention and treatment be made. The potential for further impact on the decline in death rates due to heart disease and stroke is evident as new and exciting research pathways emerge. Some examples include: The application of advances of cellular and molecular biology to the study of atherosclerosis and hypertension; research in the relationship of nutrition to cardiovascular disease; study of the effects of behavior, stress and exercise on cardiovascular patients; and new educational efforts in the area of hypertension, cholesterol and smoking aimed at the general public.

The above-mentioned research areas are only few of the many being pursued by both AHA and the NHLBI at this time. In proclaiming February as National Heart Month we are actively encouraging the continuation of this unique and successful partnership of the private sector and the Federal Government that began in 1948 with the creation of both the association and the institute. These joint efforts offer the hope that the incidence of all forms of cardiovascular disease will continue to decline in the coming years.●

FAMINE: A PREVENTABLE DISASTER

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the world is witnessing today in Africa one of the most preventable of human disasters—famine—and on a scale that is truly horrifying.

Although the international community, with the strong leadership of the United States, is beginning to respond, the tragedy is, as Dr. Jean Mayer outlines in this week's Science magazine editorial, that it is all so preventable. As he notes, "every generation redefines what is intolerable * * * in this century the world has acquired the scientific basis and the technology to predict, mitigate, and eventually prevent famines."

We know what needs to be done, writes Dr. Mayer, but it is far beyond the capacities of voluntary relief agencies, the private sector and the African nations themselves. Rather, "it must be carried by governments in cooperation with foundations, universities, and international organizations experienced in such programs."

But the United States has a unique role to play, Mr. President, as Dr. Mayer outlines in his article. I commend to the attention of the Senate the thoughtful editorial Dr. Mayer submitted to Science magazine, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From Science, Feb. 15, 1985]

PREVENTING FAMINE

Every generation redefines what is intolerable in public health as science generates the knowledge needed for action. In this century the world has acquired the scientific basis and the technology to predict, mitigate, and eventually prevent famines. I am convinced, however, that little will happen without a concerted and continuing political effort on the part of the scientific and technological community.

The devastating famine that is striking African nations from Mauritania to Ethiopia is being treated as a sudden disaster. In fact, an early warning system more comprehensive than the present Food and Agriculture Organization system could have been in place. It could have been connected with a mechanism that would trigger an immediate response to a developing crisis. This response should be based on meterological data (collected daily by international airlines among others) coupled with satellite photography (which registers color changes in vegetation as droughts become more severe), economic data on prices and stores of basic foods in famine-prone regions, and health data on the rate of growth and appearance of poor children in vulnerable areas.

This information, transmitted to a international office under the FAO and the World Health Organization, could trigger the release of emergency reserves from storage in strategic locations in cold climates. Grain ships at sea could then be diverted to the threatened area so that the famine could be contained or even prevented.

In the long run, the African problem is solvable. Agricultural self-sufficiency is possible by the end of the century, but not without a major commitment by the African nations and the developed countries, the United States in particular.

Nutrition is one area where figures can be put on human needs. The techniques of the Green Revolution have enormously increased the potential to fulfill those needs. We know what should be done: improved road systems; better soil and water management; greater availability of nitrogen, potash, and phosphate fertilizers and of pesticides, insecticides, and rodenticides; a change from slash-and-burn agriculture to appropriate modern tillage methods; better herd health and genetic improvement of herds; more research in high-yielding crops suitable for African soils and climate (together with preservation of the germplasm of existing plants of economic importance); for farmers, primary education and agricultural extension; programs in rural health and birth control; a rural credit infrastructure; and development of agriculture-related industries like canning, repair of farming equipment, and fertilizers. Africa will also need steady, and for a time increasing, food aid, which must be very carefully managed so that it does not undermine local farmers' buying power.

This effort is far beyond the capacities of voluntary relief organizations and initially unsuited to private investment, at least in the first stages. It must be carried by governments in cooperation with foundations, universities, and international organizations experienced in such programs.

The burden must be shared by the world at large, but the United States has a particular role. We have the world's largest grain surpluses. We have the most efficient agriculture per farmer (although not the highest yield per acre). We developed agricultural research to its present effectiveness (although our research still concentrates too much on higher yields for U.S. crops already in surplus, rather than on tropical agriculture). We invented agricultural extension services, land-grant colleges, the rural banking system. And, if any science can be said to be peculiar to one nation, nutrition is surely the "American" science.

With greater knowledge comes greater responsibility. It is my hope that as scientists and technicians who have generated some of this knowledge we will make sure that it is used for peaceful development of the world, and I urge Congress to commit U.S. resources to that goal.—Jean Mayer, President, Tufts University, Medford, Massachusetts 02155.●

COSPONSORSHIP OF S. 11 TO AMEND THE STEEL IMPORT STABILIZATION ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleague, Senator HEINZ, as a cosponsor of his legislation, S. 11, to amend the Steel Import Stabilization Act. This legislation will assist in the effective and undiluted implementation of the President's steel program.

In an effort to restrict undesirable surges in the level of imported steel within the parameters of the President's program, the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative is seeking voluntary restraint agreements with several countries, including Japan and Korea. This particular segment of S. 11 concerns me at this point in time.

Japanese steel constitutes a signficant portion of imported steel. Although Korean steel import levels are not as sizable as Japanese, Korean import levels have been escalating dramatically. These levels require special attention if we are to prevent any sizable adverse reactions to the agreements currently being pursued. Although the United States, Japan, and Korea have agreed in principle to overall limits on imported steel, S. 11 addresses some of the special considerations that must be made.

Of particular interest to domestic specialty steel producers is a provision to establish 27 subcategories in the negotiations with Japan and Korea. These subcategories would protect American steel producers who might be harmed if a general restraint agreement were reached where either of these countries could adhere to an overall level, yet fluctuate between categories and violate the spirit of the original agreement, thus offering little protection and assistance to those most in need of it. This legislation would also instruct the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative to unilaterally create these 27 subcategory limits if it becomes impossible to reach a voluntary restraint agreement of this nature. In order to protect our sensitive trade position in these negotiations, S. 11 will allow the President to waive these requirements if distortions occur that would cause such regulations to damage our national steel policy.

The thoroughness of this bill allows me to reach only one conclusion: that its passage would create a more viable direction in our continuing efforts to reach a balanced steel policy. I believe S. 11 to be consistent with the President's steel program, and I urge my fellow Senators to join in this constructive initiative.●

ADVANCE NOTIFICATION—PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million, or in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon receipt of such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Pursuant to an informal understanding, the Department of Defense has agreed to provide the committee with a preliminary notification 20 days before transmittal of the official notification. The official notification will be printed in the RECORD in accordance with previous practice.

I wish to inform Members of the Senate that such notification has been received.

Interested Senators may inquire as to the details of this advance notification at the office of the Committee on Foreign Relations, room SD-423.

The notification follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, February 8, 1985.

Dr. M. GRAEME BANNERMAN,
Deputy Staff Director, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR DR. BANNERMAN: By letter dated 18 February 1976, the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, indicated that you would be advised of possible transmittals to Congress of information as required by Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act. At the instruction of the Department of State, I wish to provide the following advance notification.

The Department of State is considering an offer to an East Asian recipient tentatively estimated to cost in excess of $50 million.

Sincerely,

PHILIP C. GAST,
Director.●

ANNIVERSARY OF LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I wish to express my thoughts on the occasion of the 67th anniversary of the restoration of Lithuanian independence. The brave people of Lithuania deserve our recognition. Since 1941, they have lived under forced occupation by a nation which does not recognize their rights as human beings.

We, in the United States of America, are fortunate to live in a society where our freedoms are protected by the Constitution. We are guaranteed the freedom to gather in groups of celebrants, like the Lithuanians of America do today. We may speak our opinions. We are free to practice our religions.

The Soviet Union is a nation which suppresses religion and speech. It rejects the principles of freedom and scorns human rights. The provisions embodied in the Atlantic Charter call for adherence to the principle of self-determination. The Soviet Union has defied the Atlantic Charter for over 40 years by its forcible incorporation of the Baltic States.

U.S. policy has consistently supported Freedom for Lithuania. Allow me to quote the Deputy Chairman of the U.S. Delegation to the 1980 Review Conference on the Helsinki Act.

> No occupation or acquisition of territory in contravention of international law will be recognized as legal.

This statement is exemplified by the Soviet Union's occupation of Lithuania.

I will continue to vigorously support freedom and self-determination for the people of Lithuania. I salute the American-Lithuanian community in commemoration of Lithuanian independence and freedom. All people, all over the world, must be able to pursue their dreams of liberty.●

TRIBUTE TO WINE INSTITUTE'S CODE OF ADVERTISING STANDARDS

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, on February 7, 1985, as chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse, I conducted a hearing on the issue of beer and wine advertising on radio and television. I received extensive testimony from representatives of Federal agencies, community and research organizations, consumer groups, brewers, vintners, broadcasters, advertising associations, university and constitutional scholars.

The materials and opinions presented to the subcommittee reveal divergent views on a most complex and important subject. More hearings appear warranted. At the outset of what promises to be a sharpening debate over public policy and advertising I believe it timely that I share with my colleagues an initial finding that most impressed me.

I found that voluntary Code of Advertising Standards adopted by the California wineries in 1978, through their industry organization, the Wine Institute, to be exemplary in its provisions and practice. As an example of private initiative the code stands as a model of social responsibility which deserves wider support and recognition.

The self-developed and self-policed advertising ethics have received high praise over the years from many local, State, and Federal leaders representing Government, public health, alcoholism, and community organizations. As a small example of this widespread support I would like to cite only a few of the commendatory letters that have come to my attention. In April 1978, Rita Saenz of the California Office of Alcoholism greeted the new standards with this letter to John De Luca, president of the Wine Institute:

> On behalf of the many diverse elements within the alcoholism constituency, please accept my congratulations on a very positive and forthright set of standards . . . and my compliments for your efforts toward social responsibility.

At the same time, Luther Cloud, then president of the National Council on Alcoholism, wrote:

> We believe the social significance of this Code will be recognized across the nation by alcoholism councils . . . By assuring that wine advertising will not be designed to appeal to young persons, and will not glorify or misrepresent wine use, the [California] wine industry has distinguished itself as a trendsetter in addressing contemporary issues. The alcoholism movement is well served by such voluntary action, and we publicly applaud Wine Institute for its initiative and example.

A year later, Mrs. Virginia Sparling, then President of the National PTA, included the following message in her communication:

> We commend the Wine Institute for its effort to promote responsible advertising standards . . . , and we would especially commend eliminating appeals to young people.

The Federal Trade Commission, in an advisory opinion in antitrust matters, has not encouraged Wine Institute to seek parallel guidelines from media organizations or noninstitute wineries, American and foreign. This has prompted the association to petition the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms to adopt its code as a mandatory regulation for all parts of the wine industry.

The most salient parts of the code, which addressed the major concerns of my subcommittee, merit publication:

1. A distinguishing and unique feature of wine is its traditional use with meals. Subscribers to the Code shall show foods available to be used or intended to be used in ads where wine is served.

2. Wine advertising should encourage the proper use of wine. Code subscribers shall not show: Consumption of wine for the effects its alcohol content may produce; excessive drinking as a subject for amusement, or appearances of persons who have lost control; and wine used in conjunction with feats of daring or activities requiring unusual skill.

3. Any attempt to suggest that wine directly contributes to success or achievement is unacceptable and the following restrictions apply: Wine shall not be presented as being essential to personal performance, social achievement, success, or wealth; wine shall not be associated with social, physical or personal problem solving; and wine shall not be represented as vital to social acceptability or crucial for successful entertaining.

4. Any advertisement which has particular appeal to persons below the legal drinking age is unacceptable and code subscribers shall not: Show models and personalities in advertisements who appear to be under 25 years of age; use music, language, gestures or cartoon characters specifically associated with or directed toward those below the legal drinking age; appear in children's or juvenile's magazines, newspapers, television programs, radio programs or other media specifically oriented to persons below the legal drinking age; be presented as being related to the attainment of adulthood or associated with "rites of passage" to adulthood; suggest that a wine product resembles or is similar to other beverages with particular appeal to persons below the legal drinking age; use traditional heroes of the young such as those engaged in pastimes and occupations having particular appeal to persons below the legal drinking age (for example, cowboys, race car drivers, rock stars, etc.); and use amateur or professional sports celebrities, past or present.

5. Wine advertising should in no way suggest that wine be used in connection with driving.

6. Wine advertising by code subscribers shall not appear in or directly adjacent to television or radio programs or print media which dramatize or glamorize over-consumption or inappropriate use of alcoholic beverages.

The Wine Institute has been at the forefront of many contemporary issues. In addition to its leadership on advertising matters it has called for tougher law enforcement against drunk driving offenders; and last year supported enactment of the 21-year requirement for the purchase and public possession of alcoholic beverages. For this and many other initiatives I wish to commend the leadership and efforts of John De Luca, president of Wine Institute, and his entire membership for their enlightened, responsive, and exemplary approach.●

PUTTING VIETNAM INTO PERSPECTIVE

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, for far too long now this Nation and its people have been anguishing over the causes and effects of the war in Vietnam. We are still feeling the repercussions from that experience in Southeast Asia and probably will for some time to come. Recent examples such as the disposition of the agent orange issue, the libel trial between Gen. William Westmoreland and CBS, and the unresolved issue of those men still missing and unaccounted for in Southeast Asia are reminders we are still carrying a lot of mental baggage from that era. Well, I think it is time we put the problem behind us once and for all and my dear friend and colleague Adm. JERRY DENTON, the junior Senator from Alabama, has written an excellent article on just this problem. His article entitled "Putting Vietnam Into Perspective," which appeared in the March issue of the American Legion magazine, provides, I feel, a tremendous insight into the difficulties that we as a nation have had in facing up to the issues surrounding the Vietnam war.

I can think of no more credible expert on this subject than Senator DENTON because not only did he serve heroically as a naval aviator in Vietnam but spent many years thinking about these issues as a prisoner of war in Hanoi. His scholarly effort is certainly worthwhile reading and I highly recommend it to all Members of Congress and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

PUTTING VIETNAM INTO PERSPECTIVE

(By Rear Adm. Jeremiah A. Denton, Jr., U.S.N., Ret.)

EDITOR'S NOTE.—Though this article was written before the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, Rear Adm. Denton's clear-sighted analysis of the dangers of unchecked Communist aggression and wavering American influence in world affairs is no less relevant. In fact, his views here have proved prophetic.

After a career in the United States Navy and considerable formal and informal education in international affairs, I am painfully conscious that our nation is floundering in confusion which accelerated in the late 1960s. I was then a prisoner of war in Communist North Vietnam.

I was directly affected and know firsthand what went on over there. That's why I feel I can say, "Let's look at it squarely . . . we lost the Vietnam war." In the process, we also lost some other definable and undefinable things, though perhaps only temporarily.

To help insure the loss is indeed temporary, we cannot remain numbly silent while others who would wreck America draw wrong lessons from the experience and etch them indelibly into the conscience of our nation. Some of the wrong lessons are:

The war was an immoral war in which the United States slaughtered innocent civilians;

Those who burned their draft cards were right, the cause in Vietnam was wrong;

Military service is not the "in" thing and is for volunteers only;

The United States can no longer afford to take a major role in influencing world affairs.

I would not say the military as a group is innocent of all errors in Vietnam. Nor could that be said of any military in any other war in history. But in no other war did any nation lean farther over backward trying to avoid killing innocents than did we—in spite of exceptions such as My Lai.

I believe that all of the wars fought in our history, our armed forces should rightly be most proud of their service and sacrifice in Vietnam. Our services "did their thing" under conditions that tested esprit in terms of loyalty and courage—tested them as no previous war ever did.

We endured the test and our military honor remains untarnished. Discipline shown in campaigns was outshown only by the discipline displayed after the war when the issue which had been decided militarily at such cost was being obfuscated in subsequent non-military actions.

But the cause in Vietnam was not wrong.

The issue—the cause there at stake—was whether the relative degree of freedom enjoyed in those countries (one of which was an ally to whose defense we were committed by treaty and the word of four Presidents) was worth preserving against an externally designed and empowered aggression to bring them into an utter vacuum of freedom.

The present-day holocaust in Cambodia and the late, but real, blood baths in South Vietnam and Laos have proved that our basic commitment was justified. Perhaps one-third of Cambodia's population has been slain since the war ended. Communist jackals are now fighting over the carcass of Southeast Asia. Tens of millions of human beings were doomed by our needless cop-out when Congress cut off bombing in Cambodia—bombing which was helping those trying to resist the Khmer Rouge.

The final straw came when we withdrew material aid just when South Vietnam had finally achieved the solidarity to defend itself effectively if equipment were forthcoming. When we withdrew our support, both Cambodia and South Vietnam were doomed. They fell as I knew they must.

We did make errors in Vietnam, and it is easy for me to understand how many well-meaning Americans became unsupportive of the war then. And, even now, they still suffer from what I call the "Vietnam Hangover."

Among government officials and civilians, the Vietnam Hangover has been manifested by doing away with the draft; creating a national mood making possible the invasion of Angola by Cuban troops carried by Russian ships; making possible the enslavement not only of South Vietnam, but also of Cambodia and Laos; making possible the endangering of the achievement of a proper structure for a much-needed Salt II Agreement. Afghanistan is, politically, a fallen domino. Zaire and the Horn of Africa are in peril. The energy shortage and the fantastic deficit in balance of payments are not unrelated to the Vietnam Hangover. The situation in Iran is shocking, but is only a continuation of the more rapidly-falling dominoes. We cannot afford to continue to act from a false perspective.

Our initial error, which tended to create conditions which led to other errors, was that we began in Vietnam with a too-gradualistic military approach. A small portion of the blame for that error belongs with some in the military. But most military opinion, even early on, was to apply what the U.S. Army calls "shock."

We did not apply "shock." We continued the gradualistic buildup. Personally, I believe it would have been difficult given the political factor, if not impossible, to apply that shock by U.S. land forces in South Vietnam. MacArthur and Ridgeway tried to pass on that bitterly learned legacy.

In my opinion, based on personal contact with the Vietnamese Communists for nearly eight years, that shock could have been applied easily, cheaply and humanely by air and naval means in 1965 or any subsequent year. It was finally and effectively applied in 1972 with the strategic bombing of military targets around Hanoi and by mining of and bombing near Haiphong, their major port. If 10 percent of that air and naval shock had been applied in the north in 1965, the war would have been over in a week, no freedom would have been lost and we would still have a correct perspective.

Our great folly was not in calling a series of losing plays, for some plays were bound to be ill-conceived in that difficult game. Our great folly was that after calling and executing a winning series, we snatched defeat from the mouth of victory in an orgy of confusion. Most Americans still have no idea that the strategic bombing applied in December 1972 was a complete American victory. The issue was amazingly dropped in national confusion following the war.

The confusion arose during the war from an over emphasis on two valid ideals and an under emphasis on two valid facts. The two valid ideals are these: (1) War is a prospect to be avoided if at all possible without the sacrifice of important national interests; (2) Violence against human beings is abhorrent to the concept of civilization.

The two valid facts which were under emphasized are these: (1) Notwithstanding the stated noble aim of the United Nations to outlaw aggression, Communism is a force which has found effective means of conducting aggression. These means constitute externally-supported subversions to overthrow imperfect governments, and conquest by proxy nations conducting ambiguous forms of aggression. In selective instances like Vietnam and Korea, the United States has justly chosen to commit military force to stop Communist aggression after diplomatic means were exhausted.

War is a last resort because war is hell, but slavery is an even worse hell, kills more people, lasts longer, and—if Communist aggression, which is really the imposition of slavery, is condoned by mankind today—civilization will be set back 500 years, thereby returning the conduct of international affairs to the rules of the jungle.

I am not saying that war is necessarily the only way to check Communism—deterrence is the best way. I am saying that the willingness to use decisive force when justified, and the perceived possession of that force constitute the only deterrence or actual combat combination they understand. It is the only combination that can keep the peace, prevent further aggressive spread of Communism, and protect our essential national interests abroad. Communism has some differences in form around the world, but it is still basically the enslavement of people.

(2) The second fact is that when military force is committed in a war, the object is not to twist gradually the enemy's arm, but quickly to break his will. This axiom is especially true when dealing with as small an antagonist as North Vietnam. I quite agree, however, that losing 50,000 Americans is not properly called police action—it is war, requiring national backing and congressional commitment.

As to the anti-war ideals, I agree with them. Mankind took a while to address these ideals. Civilization itself took mankind millions of years to achieve. Civilization is only about 5,000 years old, is fragile and has failed at times in a given society. But civilization has advanced in efforts to eliminate war as a routine means of settling international differences, as well as in efforts to alleviate some of the unnecessary brutalities of war. Particularly, the late 19th and the first half of the 20th centuries saw important steps in this direction with the Hague Tribunal, Geneva Conventions, the League of Nations and the United Nations. Perhaps we can dismiss the present UN as a major factor, but we cannot ignore the fact that the League and the UN did prevent many wars which would otherwise have occurred, and they limited the time and scope of some that did.

During and after World War II, the United States became a major leader in this trend. Korea was a UN action. Our going to the defense of Vietnam was in accordance with the UN Charter. Both actions were not only not immoral, but were also idealistic. The United States had not much selfish interest in Korea or South Vietnam, but as a major nation interested in the continuing development of inhibition against aggression by truly immoral nations, we committed first our diplomatic efforts, then our treasure and then our blood.

Those are the two facts and the two ideals.

On another front we must consider the NATO alliance—an anti-aggressive, truly defensive alliance which has worked. Since 1949, NATO-alliance nations have done some fighting, but, per-capita-per-year, they have lost a fraction of the lives lost throughout the rest of their history. NATO brought Soviet Communist expansion in Europe to a halt without a single casualty. But the Communist resort to ambiguous proxy aggression and their conquests by subversion are the tactics for which we have not yet found an effective answer.

To me, the big picture is that our nation became confused on these points, among others. We lost the issue as well as more than 50,000 Americans. And we lost some important degree of credibility in the world.

Our nation and others have survived even worse confusion such as our own Civil War. But the consequences of the loss of credibility still continue and they hamper our conduct of international affairs under President Carter, as they hampered them under Presidents Johnson, Nixon and Ford.

Our nation urgently needs a return to an informal bipartisan approach to foreign policy which we enjoyed from about 1942-1965. To achieve that approach, we need to help our citizenry attain a better national understanding of our place in world affairs. Our dollar-motivated media, especially television, have the power to do this but they have not done so.

During the war, big media tried to portray Thieu and his armed forces as the ones that copped out. Many still believe that lie. Our public read about the tanks and planes captured by the massive invasion from the North. They did not read that those tanks and planes did not have enough fuel or ammo for a long campaign. Americans would have fled like the South Vietnamese did had they faced the same situation.

Nor did they read that during that massive invasion by many regular army divisions, the Vietcong were no factor in the South. The Vietcong were never anything but terrorists. But to report that would be to admit that it was a lie to pretend that the trouble in South Vietnam was mainly internal.

Now, thank God, at least some in the media are showing signs of beginning to show their basic integrity and set the record straight.

In 1978 the Society of Professional Journalists gave their Award For Research to Peter Braestrup's "Big Story," a book which demonstrates how the big lie was foisted on the American public by reporting of the 1968 TET offensive. Our public was then hopelessly deluded, led to believe that what was really a military disaster for the North was a victory for them. This retrospective act of self-criticism by the press, although too late to save the Southeast Asian issue, could be an important beginning to an essential need: getting that experience sorted out, regaining national perspective on international affairs.

But movies on Vietnam still run to fantasies like "Apocalypse Now" and distortions like Jane Fonda's "Coming Home" which instill not only condemnation of our cause in the war, but also hatred of the military, contempt for our system and misunderstanding of vital issues.

NBC-TV made a movie of my book. "When Hell Was In Session," and it got very good Neilsen ratings, indicating that the public does like the truth.

TV, which carefully brought the blood and gore, but not the perspective on the war, into our living rooms, carefully avoided reporting in proportion the current big news of the world which was the story available from refugees of what is going on in Cambodia, Laos and South Vietnam. They did this because that news would reveal how wrong their earlier slant has been. But in the past few months there has been some improvement in coverage.

Newspaper column inches were as sparse as TV footage on the big story of our day—the holocaust in Cambodia. A brief wire service account in 1978 commented on the holocaust mentioning that apparently the Cambodian leaders had been "improperly-schooled" in Marxism-Leninism in the USSR and China to have developed such brutal habits. That rationale is poisonous and absurd in the face of the Stalinist purges and Communist purges in China. We can pray that the Chinese are making a real major change, but that definitely remains to be seen.

Our citizens are confused on vital issues.

Our nation's people need to be told the truth. An informed citizenry is essential to survival of a democracy. The three truths which need to be emphasized now by the media and our educational systems are these:

With its imperfections, the United States of America is the best in terms of its record of national and international justice, of any major nation in the world's history.

Communism is a great threat to out well-being and security; it is the antithesis of our principles regarding religion, family, free enterprise and the government-citizen relationship. We need to continue to pursue international ideals but, until ideals become reality, we must look to protect the interests of this nation at home and abroad. We need to continue to help relatively free nations to survive against Communism and help them with ideas and material support.

We must be true to our own valued national principles which, most importantly, brought us to this pinnacle of material and spiritual greatness. We cannot continue a trend of blindly individualistic selfishness and promote the so-called new morality which is really just the old immorality. We must try again to progress toward becoming one nation under God. No matter how far we have slipped personally or nationally we can attain well-being and security again if we act again as if we are "relying on Divine Providence."

Until we regain among our citizenry an understanding and necessary emphasis on acting from those three truths, we shall continue on the drunken road to disaster.

It's time to act! Let's clean up our minds, clean up our acts and get the great American show back on the road.●

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, while the Congress was out last week, an important anniversary occurred on February 16—the 67th anniversary of Lithuanian independence. After centuries of struggle for an independent identity, Lithuania achieved her independence in 1918, and for the next 20-odd years was able to establish her ethnic and cultural heritage in national institutions and laws. This noble effort was brutally ended in June 1940 when the Soviet Union invaded Lithuania, as well as her sister Baltic republics, and forcibly incorporated Lithuanians against their will into the U.S.S.R. Many Lithuanians were summarily deported to Russian labor camps to perish, and relentless russification was enforced on Lithuania in an effort to eradicate the Lithuanian language, religious freedom, ethnic and cultural traditions, and all other traces of Lithuanian national identity.

Moscow's suppression of all things Lithuanian continues to this day. But the spirit of a free Lithuania has not perished because it lives on in the hearts of Lithuanians both in their homeland and in exile abroad. It is fitting that we in the Congress pay tribute to this year's anniversary of Lithuanian independence, in the hope that liberty will one day return to that proud land, and in gratitude for the many fine contributions that Lithuanian-Americans have made to the heritage of their adopted country here.●

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, February 16 marked the 67th anniversary of Lithuania's Declaration of Independence. Freedom-loving people across the world bear witness daily to the values and ideals embodied in Lithuania's struggle for freedom. The yearning for self-determination and human rights is alive in the hearts of every individual who lives under the yoke of totalitarian tyranny.

The current State Department Human Rights Report reveals that Soviet efforts to suppress religious belief and eliminate independent political belief appeared to intensify in 1984. Courageously, Lithuanian Catholics displayed their continuing dedication to religious freedom by protesting, through letters and petitions, the imprisonment of Catholic priests.

As a member of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, I joined my colleagues on the Helsinki Commission in nominating six leaders of Helsinki Groups in Eastern Europe for the 1985 Nobel Peace Prize. One of these brave men is literary historian Viktoras Petkus, leader of the Lithuania Helsinki Group.

These men advocated fulfillment of the human rights principles of the 1975 Hilsinki Act and called upon the Soviet government to observe its solemn Helsinki human rights pledges. Today, Viktoras Petkus is serving a 15-year prison term, imposed on August 23, 1977, for his human rights work.

All of us must rededicate ourselves to the noble cause espoused by Viktorus Petkus and his counterparts in other Soviet-dominated countries. We must continue to support the Lithuanian people's quest for freedom. As this solemn anniversary is commemorated, our commitment to Lithuanian independence must be reaffirmed.●

VETERANS' HEALTH CARE BENEFITS

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as a member of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee, I am concerned over the President's proposed budget for the Veterans' Administration in fiscal year 1986. It is that agency which is responsible for providing benefits and services to the country's 28 million veterans, the 51 million members of their families and the 2 million survivors of deceased veterans. It is an awesome responsibility and Congress provided approximately $26 billion in fiscal year 1985 to the VA for it to meet its obligations. The President, in his budget proposal has called for roughly that same amount in fiscal year 1986.

Obviously, that is a huge figure and there are many who look upon the VA budget as an inviting target for spending reductions. What those individuals often fail to recognize is that cutting VA services, particularly VA health care, does not diminish the need for those services. That is true anytime: but it is particularly true now, as America's veteran population ages over the next decade.

All of these points are succinctly and clearly made in an excellent publication sent to me by Dan Lambert, adjutant, Department of Maine, the American Legion. That publication, "The Aging Veteran, Uncounted Costs Unkept Promises?" was prepared by the staff of the Legion's veterans planning and coordinating committee. I recommend it to my colleagues.

I ask that the publication's section entitled, "Maine's Hidden Asset," be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

MAINE'S HIDDEN ASSET

VETERANS HEALTH CARE BENEFITS CUT ACROSS ALL POLITICAL, ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL LINES

The Maine state budget includes an asset that few, if any, of those responsible for the budget are aware of. It is an asset that, in 1983, accounted for some $42 million of benefit to the citizens of the state—$42,196,771 to be exact, that the legislature of Maine did not have to raise and her politicians did not have to account for. If current challenges to the nation's largest hospital system succeed, all that could change.

Maine is home to more than 153,000 veterans, 24,700 of them over age 65. By 1990, that figure will increase to 39,100 and by the year 2000, the total will have jumped to more than 50,100. Without VA hospitals and health care systems, those veterans will have to be cared for by Maine hospitals and staffs that are already under severe strains. Can Maine afford such a budget shock? Can her citizens allow anything short of the quality care now being provided her veterans? How has such a threat arisen? And finally, what can be done to avoid its obvious consequences?

Challenges to veterans' earned benefit programs are nothing new. What sets current proposals to cut VA expenditures apart from the historical pattern is that, in 1985, it is not only the cost that is under scrutiny, but also who will bear the cost of veterans' health care—the VA, other federal agencies or the states.

Those who propose to dismantle the VA health care system consistently recommend alternatives that would, ultimately, place the burden for providing health care on the individual states. The effect of America's aging population and the increasing number of veterans over age 65 indicates that demand for health care by those aging—and possibly indigent—veterans will only increase. Thus, those veterans affected by any change in eligibility and who are residents of Maine will have nowhere else to turn but to the health care systems of Maine. This effective transfer of funding is the real nature of the threat to VA health care.

It is not apparent that the purpose of such proposals is, in their basic form, to force the states to absorb health care costs traditionally provided by the federal government. Lost in the rush for change, however, is an understanding of the multiple nature of the VA health care system's mission: to provide care tailored to the needs of veterans; to back up the military hospital system in a national emergency; to conduct research and to train the nation's health professionals; and to blaze a trail for all other medical entities in the nation in the area of geriatric care.

Coupled with the mood of less government services by the federal government and the needs of the private sector is the pressure on the federal government to stem the tide of red ink washing over the nation.

To achieve spending cuts, the government has commissioned several studies to probe the areas of waste and possible saving in government programs. Notable among them are those by the Congressional Budget Office and the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control, or the Grace Commission.

The Congressional Budget Office study was an attempt to deal with the magnitude and policy options of the impact of an aging veteran population on American society and systems, particularly the VA. Among its many recommendations were:

To convert beds in under-utilized wards, and shift long-term care patients from those wards, to nursing homes, domiciliary or outpatient care;

To convert acute care facilities to long-term care such as nursing homes;

To require reimbursement from private and public insurers;

To increase services provided by non-VA nursing homes;

To reduce eligibility or the scope of benefits.

Clearly, the impact of such sweeping changes in the VA health care system does not suggest that care or benefits be denied, only that the way and source of provision be altered. That is where the authority of Maine is affected.

The Grace Commission, likewise, saw a shifting of responsibility for care, not elimination of care, as one answer to the cost of providing care to the veteran. The findings of the Grace Commission, tasked as it was to ferret out waste and inefficiencies in the federal government's operations, have taken a short view of the problem. As in the general population, the level of elderly among veterans will increase; the demand by them for health care will coincide with reaching the stage in life when health care needs are greatest—all at a time when available health care owed them for faithful service is threatened.

The elimination of VA health care would affect all of society. The American Legion is concerned. The leadership in Maine should be concerned, too.

If the VA health care system is drastically altered, Maine's legislature would face hard decisions that could call for increasing the tax burden on its constituency.

In addition, money not spent on VA health care would represent millions of payroll dollars lost to thousands of citizens who now work for the VA in Maine. Millions of dollars in retail sales, jobs, and the tax revenue that depends on VA payrolls also would be lost.

The Governor's office, as a consequence of the loss of VA jobs and the tax dollars they produce, would face the political fallout as Maine health care, education, welfare, unemployment, and jobs training programs reel under the impact.

In the Congress, Maine legislators who may consider the VA health care budget outside their concerns will experience new realities. The critical health care needs of America's aging veteran population will be met by other programs well prepared to absorb the cost and meet the demand. For, when all is said and done, health care for the elderly, whether veteran or not, is not a luxury. It is a necessity.

Any drastic alteration of the VA health care system will not ease budget pressures; rather it further complicates matters for Maine. The loss of VA health care facilities in Maine would have a significant economic, political and social impact.

To meet only its health care responsibility to Maine veterans, the Veterans Administration provided $42,196,771 during FY 1983, Even so, the VA medical center in Maine was forced to limit availability of health care to many veterans. The projected population of Maine veterans over age 65 will place tremendous demands on an already restrictive VA budget because this population will require longer and more intensive hospital stays.

Consider for a moment the devastating impact of having no VA health care system. The VA Medical Center and clinics in Maine treated 6,398 inpatients and recorded 51,246 outpatient visits during FY 1983. Additionally, 272 veterans received nursing home care in VA facilities and community nursing homes through VA provided funds. During the same period, Maine's VA Medical Center trained 305 personnel, including 22 physician house staff. the VA Medical Center in Maine employed 1,186 people, with salaries alone for them totaling $29,818,232. It is apparent that Maine and its economy needs the VA as much as Maine's veterans do. We must build our alliance, because, not only should Maine be concerned about the health and welfare of our nation's past defenders but the state's leaders must also consider the impact further VA budget reductions and elimination of services will have on all her citizens.

Provisions and funding for medical care comprise only a small part of VA's contributions to Maine. During FY 1983 alone, total VA allocations for Maine veterans equalled $158,457,492. Included in this amount was $97,440,007 for payments to 27,809 Maine citizens who are either disabled as a result of military service (compensation), or receive financial assistance as a result of having become unable to provide for themselves (pensions); $10,814,636 in Readjustment and Vocational Rehabilitation programs; $6,186,442 for insuarance and indemnities; and $1,819,637 for construction and related costs. Considering future annual outlays, the total reaches amounts which clearly could not be provided through Maine resources alone.

In addition, proposed major VA construction in Maine is expected to exceed $30 million from FY 1985 through FY 1989. During 1984 and 1985, three smaller construction projects will cost approximately $1,077,000. These programs represent thousands of jobs for Maine residents.

Other contributions by VA to Maine include support of Vietnam Veterans Outreach Centers, burial services, regional offices, and other activities and facilities taken for granted. Clearly, a loss of any major component of VA spending in Maine is a potentially deadly blow to the state as well as to her military veterans.

Maine gains a significant benefit from the total impact of VA programs. The benefit is undoubtedly higher than just impersonal dollar figures. Medical education, research, employment, quality of life, security, peace of mind, and the ripple effect on the economy all are factors hard to calculate.

From 1974 to 1984, the VA health care system experienced a usage explosion. At the same time, the total budget for the system grew from $3 billion to $8.1 billion. But figures mislead. Projecting that ten year growth in constant 1974 dollars, the VA health care budget grew by about 1.25 percent per year.

The American Legion, the nation's largest veterans organization, is concerned about the future. Lawmakers and policy makers at every level of government share that concern. The nation's veterans do not oppose change, but any change must benefit all citizens of our country, and not be at the expense of those least able to provide for themselves.

There are more than 28 million veterans in America. Not every one of them will require medical care in a VA facility as they age, but many will. Regardless of what happens to the VA health care system, the need for care will not go away.●

SMALL TOWN BANKER HELPS FARMERS

● Mr. FORD. Mr. President, agriculture is the very backbone of this Nation. The farmers fed this Nation from its birth, and now they have become important to the economy of the entire free world. Farming is not a special interest that is isolated in a particular segment of the economy or by geographical region. Instead, it cuts across the Nation, woven as a fabric of life in a special breed of men and women—America's farm families.

Today the precious 2 percent of the population working in agriculture are in a state of crisis. Our farmers fuel the very economy of this Nation. But they are suffocating under a tremendous debt load that threatens any future viability.

With all of the problems the farmers are facing, we tend to overlook the effect their problems are having on "Main Street America." A good friend of mine, Charlie Bennett, of Breckinridge County, KY, is a prime example of how community business leaders can work together to help ease the farmer's debt burden and lessen the damaging effect on the entire community.

Mr. Bennett, a smalltown banker, was recently the subject of a Washington Post article in which his efforts to help his community's farmers were detailed. I submit this article for the RECORD as an example of how the farmers' plight relates to the entire rural community.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, February 10, 1985]

FARM COMMUNITY NOURISHED BY DEVOTED COUNTRY BANKER

LENDER CHARGES LOW RATES, DEFERS INTEREST PAYMENTS

(By Ward Sinclair)

C.D. (Charlie) Bennett isn't an elected official and he doesn't make headlines, but he just might be the most important man in Breckinridge County, Ky., these days. He is the country banker who makes the loans that keep farmers going.

His Farmers Bank, as appropriately named today as when it was founded in 1902, is one of more than 5,000 rural banks that hold about $80 billion of agricultural debt—a third of what American farmers owe.

Unlike many of its sister institutions farther west, Grain Belt lenders that are in trouble because of farmers' low prices and declining land values, Farmers Bank in Hardinsburg is in relatively good shape, due in part to the area's more diversified agricultural base. But in almost every other sense, the Farmers Bank is the prototypical country lending institution.

The rural bank is one of the engines that keep agriculture running. Or doesn't. When things go bad on the farm, things go bad in the neighboring town and things go bad at the country bank.

Reflecting the recession in the agricultural heartland, more than a dozen of these banks failed last year, as the ripples reached out and rolled over businesses that prop up and supply the farmer. Federal bank regulators predict that more than 100 will topple this year.

Bankers such as Bennett, farmstate legislators, governors and farmers warn that, unless strong action is taken, there will be devastation in rural communities that rely on agriculture and repercussions throughout the economy.

"This country was built on rural people," Bennett said the other day. "If we let rural America suffer, people not only leave the farms. They have to go somewhere and they have to do something. This could mean an even heavier drain on society. . . . I can see what's happening now in rural America costing us billions down the road—we're going to have social programs no matter what the administration says and they are going to cost money."

The Reagan administration, under pressure from farm-state legislators and the banking industry, has reacted with a debt-restructuring program aimed at helping many farmers find a way to finance spring planting. But critics, including the bankers, say the plan is unlikely to work.

Agriculture Secretary John R. Block, among other administration officials, says the recently reshaped program will work if given a chance. But, he also has said repeatedly, banks must share more of the burden if financially strapped farmers are to make it through 1985.

Bennett's bank, with about 60 percent of its loans made to farmers, already carries a sizable load. Farmers Bank makes year-to-year operating loans at 12 percent, a rate lower than normal, "because the profit is not there in agriculture and the farmer just can't pay."

Beyond that, Bennett said, "We have forgone interest for this year so farmers can put in a crop. That's just a fact of life in rural America. The people are as honest as the day is long and they'll pay it back when they can."

That means, of course, that the bank's earnings go down. Or it means that other customers must subsidize the borrowing farmer by paying higher rates on their own loans. And it means there is less money available in the general loan pool.

Most of Farmers Bank's capital comes from local depositors and most of its loans go to local people, principally farmers who rely on it for yearly operating funds.

When a local business wants to expand, it goes to Bennett for money. When the fertilizer company, the implements firm and the seed dealer need to buy supplies, they see Bennett.

The country bank is so reactive to local situations that at Farmers, for example, most of the agricultural loans are timed to coincide with tobacco farming, a major source of income for Breckinridge County farmers. Most of the tobacco loans—to small farmers who borrow between $5,000 and $10,000 yearly—come due after the burley auctions in late fall.

Now, as these farmers prepare to plant, they line up to see Charlie (like most country bankers, he's on a first-name basis with his customers) for operating money. Bennett and his staff base their decisions on farming ability and likelihood of repayment. Often, a mere handshake seals the deal.

Bennett's bank holds about $30 million in different types of deposits. It must pay for the use of that money, but it also makes money by putting the deposits to work. Much of it goes back out as loans—all in the area around Hardinsburg. Some of its money is deposited in larger banks, earning interest.

Farmers Bank also has invested about $1 million in bonds of the Farm Credit System, the farmer-operated lending network that—like the country banks—holds about one-third of the agricultural debt. As the credit crisis intensified in recent months, financial specialists expressed growing concern about the FCS.

"We invest in those bonds just as many other people do," Bennett said. "There is something about rural America that still is very basic, and a lot of individuals who feel strongly about it buy the FCS bonds. There surely would be another serious ripple effect if we see Farm Credit defaulting. The government would have to go in, no question about it."

As in many rural communities, feeling about the role of the country bank runs strong in Hardinsburg, a town of about 2,100 southwest of Louisville.

When it appeared in the early 1970s that outsiders might buy Farmers Bank, Bennett and some of his friends decided to cut them off at the pass.

There was, naturally, appeal in the idea of making some money. But, to Bennett, there was something else that bespoke the unusual relationship between country bank and country customer.

"We had to borrow money from a bigger bank in Owensboro to get control. But we bought the Farmers Bank to keep it in the community," he said, adding:

"Your rural banker has a feeling for helping rural people. That's why I went into it. I felt I could do something for the community. And we just don't loan money outside of the community."

"We are a part of the community," Bennett said, "and we support all of the local activities. We bought computers for the grade school. We contribute to all the causes. And everyone calls on us for donations. That's the way it is."●

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I speak today as one who serves a great democracy where religious freedom is an unquestioned fact of everyday life. The people of this country are horrified by accounts of persecution driven by religious hatred and intolerance of differences in others. And yet Americans have not always spoken out against such injustices, which is why we must not take for granted the Congressional Call to Conscience voiced today. No such call rang out a little over four decades ago when the Nazis were in the throes of the debacle of the final solution, the systematic extermination of the Jewish people. Our present denunciations of the Soviet Union's oppression of Jews are a public declaration that we can never again remain silent in the face of religious persecution, and a recognition that any level of intolerance, any degree or type of torment inflicted upon a people because of their religion, is a virulent disease.

In this sense, the persecution of Jews in the Soviet Union today is of one piece with the horror of the Holocaust of the 1940's. Certainly the extent of the oppression is different, as are the methods, although violence is common to both. However, the intent is the same: to stifle the very breath of life of a religion or cultural tradition, which is the freedom to bequeath upon one's children one's inheritance from the past. It is the same disease that ultimately killed 6 million Jews during World War II.

Nazis sought to eradicate the Jewish people by an all-encompassing and immediate physical extermination. The demonic travesties of their final solution are crimes which we, in the remote present, have vehemently denounced. Yet, the more gradual and less glaring cruelties of the Soviet Government toward Soviet Jews is aimed at the same result—extinguishing the flame of the Jewish religion and tradition in the Soviet Union. Without the benefit of distance in time or perspective it is more difficult perhaps to identify the parallels. However, qualified persecution is a myth. Whenever a religious group is subjected to systematic oppression because it is different from the designated norm, we must combat the same forces which bred the monstrosities of Nazism.

The Soviet Union's campaign of oppression of Jews is not a new phenomenon in Russian history. In this latest phase, however, the visible targets are now religious teachers and cultural activists as well as prominent Jewish intellectuals. Not only is the desire to leave the Soviet Union punished, but also the desire to preserve the Jewish religion and cultural tradition within the Soviet Union. In the past 6 months, 11 religious teachers and Jewish cultural activists were arrested. Four were sentenced to labor camps. The charges were engaging in anti-Soviet agitation, slander, and propaganda—the standard rhetoric used by the Government in its repressive exercises. Further attacks have come through the "Anti-Zionist Committee on the Soviet Public" which has served as a platform from which the media has launched a campaign of anti-Semitic propaganda. These developments become even more disturbing in view of the decline in emigration. In 1979, 31,000 Jews were permitted to leave the Soviet Union. In 1984 the total exodus was 896. This was 30-percent less than in 1983 and 98-percent less than in 1979. The State Department estimates that 400,000 Jews—(20 percent of the community—would emigrate if the Soviet Government would allow it.

Soviet Jews are trapped in a labyrinth, a Catch-22, created by the game of application for emigration, denials, false accusations, threats and labor camps. It is a slow process of mental and physical torture in which reality and absurdity are inextricably linked. And if we ask why it is so, that also eludes a logical answer, for the Soviet Government neither wants the Jews in its country nor does it wish to permit them to leave.

We, Members of the Congress of the United States, representatives of a few people, must not stand by in silence—dumb witnesses to the evils of our fellow men. We must raise our voices in moral indignation and do what we can to bring a halt to the Soviet's religious persecution of the Jews. The courage and stoicism shown by those Jews within the Soviet Union and others who have sought to help them from the outside must serve as an inspiration to us all. We cannot turn our backs on this fight.●

CONNECTICUT MAN COMPLETES HISTORIC RUN

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise today to honor a young Connecticut man named Jeff Keith for completing his miraculous run across America. I speak on behalf of the people of Connecticut when I extend my heartiest congratulations to Jeff and his family. He has brought a strong and valuable message to all Americans that any obstacle, no matter how great, can be overcome with the strength of will and the courage to try. He deserves the title of a true American hero, and Connecticut is extremely proud of him.

A sports enthusiast from an early age, the 22-year-old Fairfield resident returned to physical activities quickly after he lost his right leg to cancer 10 years ago. He began his comeback by lifting weights, bicycling, and swimming, and then entered downhill ski competitions, competed on his high school tennis team, and played goalie for the varsity lacrosse team at Boston College. Outside of school, he participated in a triathlon in New York State, placing 30th out of 500 in the 1½-mile swim event and finishing the 25-mile bike race and 10-mile run along with the 300 remaining competitors.

Jeff began his run 9 months ago in Boston where he was joined by his friend Edward Kennedy, Jr., son of Senator EDWARD KENNEDY. Young Kennedy also lost his leg to cancer at an early age. In reaching his goal, Jeff raised national and international awareness to issues facing the handicapped while drawing contributions from people all over the country to the American Cancer Society for research. While he made his way through Washington this summer, I had the pleasure of meeting Jeff. He spoke to the Connecticut congressional delegation and to other prominent Members of Congress emphasizing the theme of his run. He prefers to label his condition as "physically challenged" rather than physically handicapped. Perhaps the most commendable of all his efforts during his run was to provide hope and inspiration to young cancer victims with whom he met in rehabilitation centers. Jeff proved most resoundingly yesterday to these youngsters and to all of us that cancer can be beaten and that no obstacle is too great to be overcome.

Mr. President, at this time, I ask to have placed in the RECORD an article which appeared on the front page of the Hartford Courant today.

The article follows:

AMPUTEE BREAKS BARRIER—STATE RESIDENT COMPLETES RUN ACROSS COUNTRY

(By Alan Sternberg)

LOS ANGELES.—"I think there were a lot of doubters, but I always knew I would make it."

Then Jeff Keith, the 22-year-old from Fairfield, Conn., who nine months ago set off from Boston on a 3,300-mile run across America, was tossed ceremoniously from a marina dock into the Pacific Ocean.

Members of his entourage had removed his artificial leg and hoisted it aloft like a trophy.

Keith, who lost his right leg to bone cancer 10 years ago, emerged from the water, bouncing nimbly on one foot, and faced the television cameras.

His journey—the first coast-to-coast run by an amputee—had progressed from a solitary workout with little fanfare in Oklahoma and Texas to a full-blown media event in Los Angeles.

During welcoming ceremonies, attended by Mayor Thomas Bradley and celebrities, President Reagan telephoned.

"You've been an inspiration for thousands of Americans," the president told him. His remarks were amplified for the crowd.

"This is a most courageous and wonderful thing you've done, and you have our fondest wishes for continued health and the fulfillment of your dreams."

Keith repeated a theme he has used throughout the run: that amputees are not "physically handicapped" but "physically challenged."

The 6-foot-2, slightly balding Keith is now well-tanned. At 164 pounds, he is 40 pounds lighter than he was last June. His left leg is enormously developed.

During the journey, which covered seven to 20 miles a day, Keith and his group used four motor homes; three broke down. It rained for two weeks in Missouri, but he kept running. Twice, in the Midwest and in the lee of the Rockies, he and the crew had to drive due south—without reducing the final distance—to find warmer weather and better running conditions. He developed blisters on his amputated right limb in Oklahoma in October and had to stop for three days. He slogged through a snowstorm that deposited 14 inches in the New Mexico mountains. He wore out 39 pairs of sneakers and two artificial legs.

Keith undertook his run as a spirit-raiser for cancer victims and the American Cancer Society. He was greatly influenced by another amputee—Terry Fox, a Canadian who ran two-thirds of the way across Canada before the cancer that had claimed his leg recurred. Fox died in Thunder Bay, Ontario, in 1981.

Keith, who underwent 1½ years of chemotheraphy a decade ago, does not expect any recurrences.

"I wanted to do it," he said of the run. "I thought about it while I was in college, and finally last year I started putting the plans down on paper. It cheers people up. It helps them. It shows what's possible. A lot of people aren't aware of the progress that's been made with artificial limbs."

At the finale, the 6½-pound artificial leg was shod in a gray Saucony running shoe, a kind of outpost of normality at the end of the gold-colored, metallic device. The leg featured a hydraulic cylinder at the knee and a white plastic socket that cupped over the vestige of Keith's thigh.

Still, if his legs didn't match, the shoes did, and left, right, left, right they went down the road.

Keith ran by planting his right leg—the artificial one—then pushing off it, bouncing twice on his left foot in a kind of skipping motion, and planting the right leg again. It was an awkward gait made graceful through millions of repetitions across 16 states and 3,300 miles. Using it, he made deceptively fast progress, moving at the pace of a steady jog with a kind of relentless, rolling rhythm.

In the smog-dulled Los Angeles sunlight at 9:10 a.m. Sunday, two men who design artificial limbs for a living were standing on top of the latest motor home. It was rolling at 5 miles per hour down Venice Boulevard through a neighborhood filled with auto body shops, liquor stores and Mexican food stands.

"He's about 10 strides faster per mile than the last time I saw him." said Alan Finniesston, who built the leg a year ago. "Then, he was doing 15-minute miles. Now he's down to about 12.

"Of course," he added, "the last time I saw him was in Maryland."

The designers of artificial limbs—four limbs, each valued at $7,000 were donated to Keith—were here because Keith was a symbol of the progress that has been made with artificial limbs and because Keith had proved to be a valuable laboratory. Nobody else has ever put an artificial leg under such stress.

Designers said the information could be valuable to amputees who seek more active lives, especially in sports. Jan Stokosa, director of the Institute for the Advancement of Prosthetics in Lansing, Mich., said he will work with Keith to come up with a leg that will enable Keith to run "leg over leg"—that is, in normal fashion.

Prosthetists, as designers of artificial limbs are called, cite the advances that made it possible for Jeff Keith to run across the nation on an artificial leg:

The foot of the device, known as the "Seattle foot," is made of a resilient plastic that flexes and then springs back, propelling the body forward much as the big toe of a normal foot does during walking or running.

The hydraulic cylinder at the knee, devised five years ago, controls the swing of the artificial leg so that it stays in equilibrium; as the pace increases, more hydraulic force comes to bear to keep the lower appendage from swinging too wildly.

A thin, clear, plastic film, originally designed by Johnson & Johnson as a dressing for wounds, eases the problem of blisters, bleeding and cuts caused by friction between the artificial limb and the human appendage.

For years, these consequences have kept amputees from strenuous activity.

But last year, while training for his run, Keith found that the adhesive-backed film, called Bioclusive, protected his thigh from the constant chafing.

Keith was already a celebrity in Los Angeles several days before he crossed the finish line.

Friday night he was introduced at a basketball game between the Los Angeles Lakers and the Atlanta Hawks. "The place went nuts," said Hugh Curran, Keith's buddy during their days at Boston College. "They couldn't believe this guy out on the court had gone across the country on an artificial leg."

Saturday at noon, at a basketball game between the University of Southern California and the University of Arizona, Keith received a jersey and hat from USC President James Zumberge and had his picture taken while surrounded by USC cheerleaders.

Then a Saturday night appearance at a Los Angeles Kings hockey game was canceled by Curran, the group's informal manager, "because everyone's too tired."

Later Saturday there was a two-hour cocktail reception for the press and Keith's crew, and on Sunday Keith attended mass and a reception at Loyola Marymount University and was interviewed on NBC television.●

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON). Time for morning business has expired.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now go into executive session to consider the nomination of Edwin Meese III, to be Attorney General.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I realize that the distinguished majority leader can move, if there is an objection to proceeding to the nomination. I merely want to ask a question.

I note that on the Executive Calendar, in respect to the nomination of Mr. Meese, there is no asterisk which would signify the nominee's commitment to respond to a request to appear to testify before a duly constituted committee of the Senate.

Can the distinguished majority leader give assurance that that asterisk—which would indicate such commitment on the part of the nominee to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate—will appear on the Executive Calendar tomorrow?

Mr. DOLE. I certainly give that assurance.

I should like to have the response of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, if the Senator desires that assurance, I am sure we can get it. The asterisk did not appear in connection with the name of Mr. Baker to be Secretary of the Treasury or the other Cabinet officers whose nominations were confirmed last week.

Mr. BYRD. Those nominations were confirmed without the asterisk?

Mr. THURMOND. I believe they were.

Mr. BYRD. I am sorry there was an oversight on the part of those of us——

Mr. DOLE. We can give that assurance.

Mr. BYRD. That assurance is given, that the calendar will so show tomorrow?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

I have no objection to the distinguished majority leader's motion.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I say to the majority leader that it is not for the purpose of delaying the consideration of the nomination of Mr. Meese, but there are certain matters pending—or we hope will be pending—on the farm credit crisis—and we want to stress the need for consideration of that type of legislation or indication from the administration as to how it would address this problem immediately.

It is only for that purpose that I think we should at least have a vote on this. So I will object, Mr. President, and I ask for the yeas and nays when the motion is made to proceed.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MELCHER. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. I can report to the distinguished Senator from Montana and other Senators that we have just concluded a brief meeting in the majority leader's office with the chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee [Mr. HELMS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON], and the Senator from Kansas, where we discussed, in a general way, what might be done on the farm credit problem.

We left that meeting after directing staff to contact the USDA, the OMB, and other appropriate agencies to go over a list of suggestions that were presented. We have started the hearing process of going over a number of suggestions, and we believe some progress can be made.

I hope—this is only a hope, and I understand that any Senator can do what he wishes—that we will not hold the Meese nomination hostage, that at least we will move to proceed. I hope there is no objection to proceeding to the nomination.

If, in fact, there is a determination by certain Senators not to let us vote on the Meese nomination, that is a determination they must make.

But I think I have correctly described the progress so far.

I yield to the distinguished chairmant of the Agriculture Committee if he has any comments.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader is exactly right. We have been working on this for several weeks, as my friend from Montana knows, and we are now embarked on a two-pronged procedure. One is to see how much can be done administratively, and then analyze what we should do legislatively.

I do not think there is anything to be gained, I say to the majority leader, from delaying the consideration of the Meese nomination because we are going full-speed ahead on the credit problem anyhow. So I hope that there will not be any delay in it.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, do I have the floor yet?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No Senator has the floor, and a unanimous-consent request is pending, and it is not debatable.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. That is under the reservation; is that correct?

Mr. MELCHER. Yes, under the reservation.

Mr. President, as I understand the majority leader and the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, the discussion is two-pronged. I assume one of those prongs is with the White House. Did I understand the Chairman correctly?

Mr. HELMS. We are trying to pursue every available course that will expedite precisely what the Senator wants to do, what I want to do, and what all Senators want to do.

Of course, the administration will be involved in terms of what can be done administratively. Then we will determine what that is and then we will proceed to see what we can or should do legislatively.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the chairman.

Mr. President, will the Majority Leader yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. MELCHER. Is it possible that, even prior to the final vote on the Meese nomination, we may have worked out a solution to this that is meaningful in terms of farm credit?

Mr. DOLE. I say to my friend from Montana that that is a possibility. But if we make the assumption that we cannot complete the Meese nomination until we work out a package on farm credit, some Member of the Senate might decide we should not have a farm package. As I understand it, there is some urgency about this. If we start playing political games rather than responding to the real concerns of these issues, then we are finished. The majority leader is not going to participate in that.

I hope that we all want to reduce the deficit and that we do not set a bad example on our first action in the Senate in dealing with the farm credit crisis. Something needs to be done, but it has to be reasonable, sensible, and we have to have broad support.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. MELCHER. I promised to yield first to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. PRYOR. I thank the distinguished Senator from Montana for yielding.

I wish to pose a question to the distinguished chairman of the Agriculture Committee. The distinguished chairman several times in the last few moments has used the word "we." "We are working on a program; we are working on a farm credit deal; we are working on something." Who is "we"?

Mr. HELMS. Everyone who was present at the various meetings.

Mr. PRYOR. I do not know that there has been any meeting of the Agriculture Committee yet. Is this Mr. Stockman or Mr. Block and the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, or who is "we"? That is what I am interested in.

Mr. HELMS. The Senator can include himself in that.

Mr. PRYOR. I have not been invited to any of them.

Mr. HELMS. The others were not invited. They requested a meeting with the majority leader.

The Senator from Arkansas can request a meeting with anyone whom he pleases, and I will be glad to meet with him.

Mr. PRYOR. I want to sort of clarify the statement because it appears that we are holding out, that we are meeting and we are about to come out with something, and frankly I do not know that anyone is about to come out with anything, and I take great reservation to the distinguished chairman——

Mr. HELMS. I do not think the Senator should take offense at the meeting that was just held, and I was alluding to the meeting that was just held, and in that context I used the word "we," because I did go to that meeting at the request of Senators EXON, BOREN, and others.

I wish the Senator had been there. I did not designate who was to be there.

Mr. PRYOR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HELMS. The Senator is welcome.

Mr. MELCHER. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Senator from Montana.

Mr. President, I say to my colleague from Montana that at this point in time I hope he will reconsider objecting to the request to go into executive session to consider the Meese nomination.

None of us are playing games. I think we all know that. We are deadly in earnest, and I think we are all attempting now to talk in good faith and to negotiate in good faith to work out the answer to a very serious immediate problem.

It is very clear in conscience several of us feel that we cannot go to a vote on the Meese nomination until we have been assured that there will be an effective emergency package to deal with the agricultural crisis scheduled for the Senate to act upon within the very near future, the time certain and with some specificity as to what is in that package.

But, on the other hand, I think while we are continuing our negotiations in good faith, it would be appropriate that we not object to at least going to the Meese nomination, to allow it to be taken up so that the discussion could begin on that nomination while we can continue our deliberations.

I say again my own feelings about the need to delay a vote on the Meese nomination until we have some understanding on the farm package is not a matter of individual personalities. It has nothing to do with any personal objections on my part in regard to the Meese nomination. It is simply the matter that I in conscience, and I know the Senator from Nebraska and others and I am sure the Senator from Montana also, feel that we simply in conscience cannot allow the farm crisis to go on unattended any longer but we must move on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Montana has expired.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for 1 additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MELCHER. I am not going to delay this process. I think there is going to be plenty of time to debate this. But what I earnestly ask of all of my colleagues, and particularly the majority leader and the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, is to lay this matter directly before the President and get a resolution very quickly.

What David Stockman says, or John Block as Secretary of Agriculture says, is irrelevant to the massive crisis that faces American agriculture, and it is a question that deserves and demands the attention of the President immediately.

So I just want to emphasize my request to my two distinguished colleagues that they get that answer very promptly and there be a meaningful answer, because what Stockman has said and what Secretary Block has said is meaningless and is irrelevant to the facts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Montana has expired.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. Does the Senator reserve the right to object?

Mr. DIXON. I beg pardon.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I do not intend to object, because I think the quicker we move ahead with the consideration of the Meese nomination the better off those of us who are trying to work out some kind of a compromise that is acceptable to the farmers would be. I simply say that I suspect that there is going to be a great delay of maybe 2 or 3 months, 2 or 3 years possibly, hopefully, on the Meese confirmation unless something forthcoming can be arranged with the White House, the President, and not Mr. Stockman or Mr. Block, who are the temporary popular punching bags.

I simply say that those of us who have been moving in this area honestly feel that the quicker we get the Meese nomination up for consideration the stronger position we will be in rather than the weaker position.

I have been very fearful, frankly, talking out of school, that the majority leader might decide to put off the Meese nomination to some other day and take up something like the highway construction bill or aid to starving people in Africa. It would be much more difficult, it seems to this Senator from Nebraska, to be delaying that type of action.

I think it is in my interest and what Senator BOREN and I and most of us are trying to get done to get the Meese nomination out on the table.

I suspect that, with all the parliamentary skill that the Senator from Kansas has, he probably has some anecdote to that, but at least that is my thinking at the present time, and I hope that we move as quickly as possible to bring up the Meese nomination with the clear understanding that there is no time agreement on how long we might debate that measure.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, may I address the majority leader on a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. President, pursuant to the conference that was held by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Senator EXON]; the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Senator BOREN]; the distinguished chairman of the Agriculture Committee [Senator HELMS]; this Senator, and the majority leader, I now wish to ask unanimous consent that the bill I introduced a week or so ago on February 7, S. 433, which is held on the calendar by unanimous-consent agreement with the majority leader and the chairman of the Agriculture Committee and others, pursuant to our agreement of today, be continued on the calendar, held on the calendar until next Monday, February 25. May I have unanimous consent to do that? That is the bill that would permit a one-third advance on the loans from the ASCS, which could be obtained by the farmer after harvest in the fall, in the spring, in order to permit farmers in the country to buy feed so they can put in a crop, because they cannot harvest a crop if they do not put in a crop.

I ask unanimous consent to hold that on the calendar.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, how many unanimous-consent requests are before the Senate at this point?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. There are two pending.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I had not expected my first words offered in this Chamber would be to engage in polemics with the distinguished majority leader, but when I came to the floor I heard the distinguished majority leader say that he did not want us to engage in political games. Those of us who are seeing thousands of our farmers go under in our respective States are not here to play political games.

What I cannot, for the life of me, understand is why it is more important for our country now to take the time of the Senate to take up the nomination of Ed Meese to be Attorney General when, in fact, our family farmers are going under day after day. The Justice Department seems to be operating quite well. The bureaucrats are busy, law enforcement goes on apace, and yet we are taking the time in the Senate to debate and discuss the nomination of Ed Meese to be Attorney General.

I would like to ask, if I might, the distinguished majority leader why it is more important for us to take the time to act on Ed Meese's nomination rather than to take up important agriculture legislation that will stop the forced bankruptcies of our farmers, the liquidation of banks that are going under in my State, and I am sure the majority leader's State, too. I wonder why it is more important to do this than to take up necessary agriculture legislation which we could pass this week.

Mr. DOLE. If I might respond to the distinguished Senator from Iowa, as I understand it, the bill was just introduced today and there is another being held at the desk. There have been no hearings; really no discussion.

Ed Meese has been waiting now for 1 year to become Attorney General. I think it is appropriate that we take up the Meese nomination. In addition to that, there has been a plan announced by the administration to address the farm credit problem.

We have been unsuccessfully trying to solve the farm crisis around here for 40 years. That is one reason why farmers in my State of Kansas and in other States are in such difficulty. Every year we have another crisis and another solution.

The Federal Government has spent between $50 and $60 billion in the last 4 years on agriculture programs. And we may now have a problem we need to address and address very quickly. But it is my view that if everybody starts putting the pressure on for instant action on the farm credit issue, we may not get around to addressing the real problem.

We need to determine at the outset what needs to be done. We have and will continue to approach this issue in good faith. The administration has announced a debt restructuring program including $650 million in loan guarantees. We have been told that this level of guarantees could be modified. It could go to $1 or $2 billion.

So it would seem to me that we ought to move on with the Meese nomination, continue to discuss the farm credit crisis, and see if it can be addressed responsibly.

I do not know anybody who has a solution. We all have ideas, but I have not seen one that everyone has recognized and accepted as a solution to the farm credit problem.

Mr. HARKIN. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, Ed Meese may have been waiting for 1 year to become Attorney General, but I have farmers in my home State of Iowa who have been waiting at least 2 or 3 years to have something done about their plight. We have farmers right now who, for the lack of some adequate financing, will not be able to get the crop in. That could be done this week by this body in concert with the House of Representatives. Mr. Meese still has a job and an income; he can wait a little longer to change jobs.

Mr. DOLE. May I ask whether the distinguished Senator from Iowa has a bill pending?

Mr. HARKIN. Senator Dixon has a bill.

Mr. DOLE. I was under the impression, based on your earlier remarks, that you must have a bill.

Mr. HARKIN. Do you want me to write one? I could write one right now for you. You know that.

We could do a lot of things, as the Senator knows, and we have not had one meeting of the Agriculture Committee yet, and the Senate has been here for almost 2 months. The farmers have been crying out across this land for us to do something and we are taking up Ed Meese's nomination. That is why I was reserving the right to object, because we are not here to play political games, but we are here to conduct the most important business of this country which I believe is to help save our family farmers.

Mr. DOLE. In response to the distinguished Senator from Iowa, Mr. President, I would say I have no objection to that last statement. I do not know of any Members of the Senate, and some have been on the Agriculture Committee for a long time, that have not been sensitive to the needs of the farmers. I would only say that there are a lot of ideas and, as far as this Senator knows, they have not yet gelled. We are looking at many different ideas. We may be able to work out an improved program. The distinguished Senator from Illinois says he has a program that will not cost one dime. If that is the case, we may be prepared to move quickly.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, if my colleague from Iowa will permit me, may I say to the majority leader that this has not been clarified. I wonder if the Chair would rule on my unanimous-consent request that S. 433 be held on the calendar until next Monday, February 25. May I have unanimous consent in accordance with the earlier agreement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Hearing none, it is so ordered.

Is there objection to the majority leader's request for unanimous consent?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

NOMINATION OF EDWIN MEESE III TO BE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read the nomination of Edwin Meese III, of California, to be Attorney General.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to strongly support President Reagan's nomination of Edwin Meese III to be Attorney General of the United States, and to express my hope that the Senate will act without delay in confirming Mr. Meese to this important position.

As my colleagues are well aware, this nomination has been before the Senate since February of last year. Now, I believe all of the issues relevant to this nomination have now been resolved in Mr. Meese's favor. It is time for the Senate to vote on this matter.

As this Nation's chief law enforcement officer, the Attorney General is one of the most important officials in the Federal Government. Mr. Meese has a long and distinguished record of public service and experience in the field of law enforcement, and I believe he is well qualified to be Attorney General of the United States.

I also consider Mr. Meese to be firmly committed to the fair and impartial administration of justice for all Americans and to upholding the independence of the Justice Department.

Mr. President, this nomination has been subjected to some of the most intense and exhaustive scrutiny I have witnessed in my Senate career. In every case, the facts have clearly shown that Mr. Meese has violated no criminal laws and has acted ethically in his business and personal dealings.

We have, therefore, arrived at a point where all speculation about criminal and ethical violations has been completely dismissed, and each Member of this Chamber must decide whether he or she believes Edwin Meese is otherwise qualified to be Attorney General.

That decision, whether based on personal opinion, political philosophy, or any other consideration, can be expressed in a vote on this matter.

I would like to recount for the Senate the history of this nomination, which includes seven separate hearings by the Judiciary Committee, during which more than 50 witnesses testified. I believe the record of these proceedings clearly shows that this nomination should not be delayed any further.

In February 1984, when the Judiciary Committee first received this nomination, four hearings were held, lasting from March 1 to 6. At that time, questions arose concerning whether Mr. Meese had violated criminal statutes in his official and financial dealings.

The committee's ranking minority member, Senator BIDEN, and I formally requested on March 22 that an independent counsel be appointed to resolve those questions.

Mr. Meese himself independently requested such a probe on the same day.

As to the investigation and report of independent counsel, Mr. Jacob Stein was selected as the independent counsel to investigate these matters. His investigation lasted more than 5 months and generated a report of almost 400 pages. The report is thorough, complete, and true to its mandate: the investigation of any possible violation of criminal law by Mr. Meese. its conclusions are strong and unequivocal: there is no basis whatsoever for a criminal prosecution of Mr. Meese. I want to add that the investigation covered not only those issues outlined by Senator BIDEN and me, but five others deemed relevant by the independent counsel.

I think it is worthwhile at this time to review the conclusions and scope of Mr. Stein's efforts in order to demonstrate the thorough nature of this investigation. So, I shall quote briefly:

The office of Independent Counsel conducted eleven separate inquiries relating to Edwin Meese III. They were:

1. Mr. Meese's failure to include in his Financial Disclosure Statements a $15,000 loan made by Edwin Thomas to Mrs. Meese.

2. The relationship, if any, of certain loans made to Mr. and Mrs. Meese and the appointment of Edwin Thomas, Gretchen Thomas, Tad Thomas, John McKean, Gordon Luce, Edwin Gray, Marc Sandstrom, Clarence Pendleton, and Thomas Barrack to federal jobs.

3. Mr. Meese's and his family's stock trading.

4. Whether Mr. Meese obtained special treatment from government agencies for business entities in which he had a financial interest.

5. Mr. Meese's change of status from the retired Army Reserve to the Active Reserve and his later military promotion.

6. Mr. Meese's statements to the Subcommittee on Human Resources of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, House of Representatives, and the Senate Judiciary Committee, concerning Carter campaign materials.

7. Mr. Meese's retention of cuff links given to him by the government of South Korea.

8. Mr. Meese's receipt of payments by the Presidential Transition Trust and the Presidential Transition Foundation.

9. Mr. Meese's reporting on his Financial Disclosure Statements of reimbursements for travel expenses.

10. Mrs. Meese's receipt of funds from the William Moss Institute.

11. Mr. Meese's connection, if any, with Federal grants to Pepperdine University and the American University.

Allegations 1-6 were identified in the Order Appointing Independent Counsel.

Allegations 7-11 came to our attention during the investigation.

In the course of the investigation, we examined all documents we believed might be relevant. This included files of the White House Office of Presidential Personnel, the Counsel to the President, and White House Central Files relating to how individuals who allegedly had financial relationships with Mr. Meese were considered for Federal positions. Agendas and handwritten notes taken at White House Senior Staff meetings were reviewed. We also examined numerous files and other documents in the possession of Mr. Meese and his staff, including correspondence, entries in Mr. Meese's telephone logs and daily schedules and contemporaneous notes taken by Mr. Meese and by members of his staff. We obtained similar documentation from other government agencies, including the General Services Administration, the Merit Systems Protection Board, the Departments of Interior, Commerce and Labor, the Small Business Administration, and the Departments of Defense and the Army, relating to how certain individuals were considered for Federal positions, and to other allegations listed above. We obtained documents from various witnesses who were considered for Federal positions or who had knowledge relating to such consideration. Finally, we obtained documents and other information from entities which independently conducted inquiries into certain allegations. They included the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the General Accounting Office, the Securities and Exchange Commission, entries in Mr. Meese's telepone logs and daily schedules, and contemporaneous notes taken by Mr. Meese and by members of his staff.

We were refused no documents we sought.

With respect to Mr. Meese's financial transactions and his reporting of those transactions, we examined all documents we believed might shed light on the drafting, preparation and review of Mr. Meese's Financial Disclosure Statements, including files maintanined by his office and by White House Counsel. These files contained handwritten and typewritten drafts, working papers, memoranda, notes and internal White House communications. We obtained records of all of Mr. Meese's tax returns and his accountants' tax preparation workpapers and internal notes and memoranda for the relevant years.

Before reaching the conclusions we set forth in this Report, we conducted investigative interviews with over 200 witnesses. With rare exception, each interview was conducted by at least two staff members. Forty-five of the witnesses testified before a Federal grand jury empaneled on May 8, 1984, by the United States District Court in the District of Columbia. Mr. and Mrs. Meese were among those who testified. No witness refused to testify or sought immunity in consideration of testifying.

Based upon the investigation described above, we find no basis with respect to any of the eleven allegations for the bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese for the violation of a Federal criminal statute.

Mr. President, these words from the independent counsel's report clearly vindicate Mr. Meese from any criminal wrongdoing.

As to the reconsideration of Mr. Meese's nomination, prior to completion of this investigation, I decided on September 7 of last year to remove Mr. Meese's nomination from the committee's agenda. I did so because I felt that any further consideration of the matter during the election season would be overly politicized and would not serve the public's best interest.

With the election over, Mr. Meese's nomination was resubmitted to the Senate on January 4, 1985, and the Judiciary Committee began a new round of hearings on January 29, which lasted 3 days.

While these new hearings were underway, new questions arose as to whether Mr. Meese had complied with Government ethics requirements during his service to President Reagan.

To determine the facts in this matter, I summoned Mr. David Martin, Director of the Office of Government Ethics, and two of his staff attorneys to testify before the committee.

At the same time, I asked that an internal staff memorandum, prepared by two of Mr. Martin's staff attorneys regarding Mr. Meese's compliance with Government ethics statutes, be submitted to the committee.

Since this document was an internal one, and did not represent the final decision of the Office of Government Ethics or any of its staff attorneys, Mr. Martin requested that the memorandum be reviewed by the committee on a confidential basis.

In an effort to clear the air over this entire issue, Senator BIDEN and I later requested that the document be made public. We wanted all the facts to come out. Mr. Martin agreed to honor that request, although he expressed concern over public disclosure of an internal working document.

During his testimony, Mr. Martin acknowledged that his staff attorneys had indicated in the memorandum that Mr. Meese's dealings with John McKean had created what they called an "appearance problem."

Under questioning from the committee, Mr. F. Gary Davis, the senior staff attorney responsible for drafting the memorandum, testified that his term "appearance problem" did not mean there was an impropriety—only that matter required further investigation.

Davis also testified that upon further examination of the facts, there was no violation of the Office of Government Ethics' code of conduct by Mr. Meese.

I agree with those findings, since the mere perception or appearance of impropriety must disappear once the facts conclusively show that there was no violation of the law. I think it is clear that Mr. Martin and his staff acted fairly, impartially, and independently in reaching that conclusion.

The committee finished its second round of hearings on January 31, 1985, and voted 12 to 6 on February 5, 1985, to send the nomination to the Senate floor with a favorable recommendation.

All questions about whether Mr. Meese acted within the law have now been answered, and it is time for the Senate to vote on this nomination. I hope that we can do so without further unreasonable delay since any such delay would be unfair to a number of people.

It would be unfair to President Reagan, who wants Mr. Meese to serve in his Cabinet, and as any President, deserves to have a prompt decision by the Senate on his nominations.

It would be unfair to outgoing Attorney General William French Smith, who has indicated his desire to return to private life after a distinguished career of public service.

It would be unfair to Mr. Meese himself, who has demonstrated to the Judiciary Committee that his conduct in both his business and official dealings has been proper.

Most important, any further delay would be unfair to the American people, who have every right to expect and demand that the processes of their National Government, as established in our Constitution, function in a timely and responsible manner.

Therefore, out of attention to our duty as Senators, and out of decency to this nominee, we must press forward on this matter and come to a decision—one way or the other—without any further delay.

I am confident that Mr. Meese is a man of ability, dedication, honesty, and integrity, and one who will be faithful to the trust reposed in him.

On behalf of the Judiciary Committee, I recommend that the Senate approve Mr. Meese for the position of Attorney General of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of the nomination of Mr. Edwin Meese to be Attorney General of the United States. I do so because I believe him to be an individual of substantial character, professional competence, and integrity. Mr. Meese will serve his country with high distinction as Attorney General.

The Judiciary Committee, on which I serve, has had the opportunity to learn a great deal about Mr. Meese's personal and professional fitness over the course of the past year. We have scrutinized this nomination with as much care and intensity as any Presidential nomination in recent years. We have conducted an exhaustive series of hearings on Mr. Meese; we have quizzed Mr. Meese and other knowledgable individuals minutely about matters relating to his conduct as a public servant; we have submitted hundreds of interrogatories to Mr. Meese on matters of conduct and substance; we have triggered a massively detailed investigation by the special counsel; we have witnessed an equally far-reaching investigation of Mr. Meese by the independent Office of Government Ethics; each of us on the committee has weighed and deliberated upon this nomination for more than a year.

What is the product of all this? In my own judgement, the product is a record on Mr. Meese that demands his confirmation at this time. It is a record that shows him to be a dedicated and committed public servant, both in California and in Washington, both in State and National Government—indeed so dedicated and committed that his and his family's personal situation has suffered as a direct result. It is a record that shows Mr. Meese to be an intelligent and respected member of his bar—both as a practitioner and an educator. It is a record that shows Mr. Meese to be unswervingly committed to the rule of law, strong and effective enforcement of that law, and the application of that law in a fair and just and equal manner to all persons.

Further, the record established by the Judiciary Committee, as well as by the special counsel and the Office of Government Ethics, demonstrates that there are no blemishes of any sort in Mr. Meese's history that warrant the rejection of his nomination. The report of the special counsel concluded that any allegations of criminal misconduct on his part were baseless; the report and testimony by the Office of Government Ethics failed to identify any ethical breaches on Mr. Meese's behalf; and the committee has failed to uncover any additional information or evidence that would suggest that he has conducted himself in a manner unworthy of the position of Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. President, at this point in the RECORD, I would like to submit for the consideration of colleagues a summary analysis of the allegations of wrongdoing made, chiefly by Common Cause, against Mr. Meese as well as the conclusions of the special counsel and the Government Ethics Office after conducting independent and thorough investigations. They make clear, in my opinion, that despite all the smoke that has been blown for the past year about Mr. Meese that there is simply no evidence that he has ever failed to comport himself in his public service in the most responsible manner possible.

I am confident that, if my colleagues will take the time to assess the record of the committee, the nomination of Mr. Meese will be approved by this body by an overwhelming margin. There is not simply an absence of evidence of any misconduct; more importantly, there is a wealth of evidence on the caliber and professional competence of the nominee. I strongly urge my colleagues to support the present nomination. Mr. Meese will become an outstanding Attorney General of the United States.

I ask unanimous consent that that summary analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTRODUCTION

This is a compilation of the conclusions reached by those charged with investigating and analyzing the conduct of Mr. Edwin Meese III. They have been drawn, and in some cases condensed, from three sources: the report issued by the Independent Counsel, Jacob Stein—cited as "Report of Independent Counsel; the working paper prepared by two staff attorneys at the Office of Government Ethics—cited as "working paper"; and, the cover letter written by the Director of the Office of Government Ethics, David Martin, which accompanied the staff working paper when it was released to the public—cited as "cover letter". It is important to understand the interrelationship of the latter two sources.

On January 29, 1985, the Director of the Office of Government Ethics, David Martin, made an exception to a long-standing policy of that office and publicly released the working paper. He did so, following a partial "leak" to the press, in response to a request made by Senators Thurmond and Biden of the Senate Judiciary Committee based upon their belief that it was necessary "to openly resolve any issues regarding the nomination of Edwin Meese III to be Attorney General of the United States." (cover letter, p. 1) The cover letter which Mr. Martin attached to the working papers serves two important purposes.

First, Mr. Martin's cover letter explains the context in which the working paper was prepared. He states that the working paper was "an exhaustive review of the report of the Independent Counsel" prepared to aid the Office of Government Ethics in "determining whether or not there were any actual conflicts of interest or any other ethics-related problems raised, but not addressed, by the Independent Counsel." He had instructed the two staff attorneys assigned the project to "raise all matters that might present problems. (He) put no restrictions or limitations on their review." This, Mr. Martin explained in the letter, was in the tradition of the "open and robust internal communications regarding sensitive matters" on which his office has always prided itself. (cover letter, p. 1)

As a working paper, Mr. Martin cautioned, the document did "not represent the final decision-making act of (the Office of Government Ethics), nor does it represent the final conclusion reached by its authors. It was truly part of an on-going deliberative process which properly should not be disclosed." (cover letter, p. 1)

The second purpose of the cover letter was to declare again that "Mr. Meese was in compliance with applicable laws and regulations regarding conflicts of interest," and to explain how the issues raised as potential problems in the working paper had been resolved in Mr. Meese's favor "after a series of meetings and discussions which included (OGE) Chief Counsel, Donald Campbell; and the authors of the working paper, Gary Davis and Nancy Feathers. Upon "further examination and factual development, it was my judgment that there was no substance to the appearance problem based on the facts as developed * * *," Mr. Martin wrote. He went on to say that he was satisfied "That Mr. Meese had not lost his complete independence or impartiality." (cover letter, p. 2)

The work of the Office of Government Ethics then must be looked at in its entirety—the working paper as clarified by the cover letter—in order to accurately assess that office's evaluation of Mr. Meese's activities in his current position as Counsellor to the President. Therefore, this compilation cites the final determinations detailed in the cover letter as well as the initial observations explored in the working paper. In cases where either the cover letter or the working paper is silent on an issue, I have, of course, included the single source since it is the only available indication of the Office of Government Ethics' findings other than its official conclusion that "Mr. Meese was in compliance with applicable laws and regulations regarding conflicts of interest." (cover letter, p. 1)

This compilation is organized according to the eleven separate inquiries conducted by the Independent Counsel. After listing the specific inquiry, the conclusion reached by the Independent Counsel is provided. This is followed by the determination of the Office of Government Ethics concerning the inquiry as found in either the cover letter or working paper.

COMPILATION OF CONCLUSIONS RELATING TO THE CONDUCT OF EDWIN MEESE III

(Prepared by Senator Orrin Hatch)

The Office of Independent Counsel conducted eleven separate inquiries relating to Edwin Meese III. They were:

1. Mr. Meese's failure to include in his Financial Disclosure Statements a $15,000 loan made by Edwin Thomas to Mrs. Meese.

2. The relationship, if any, of certain loans made to Mr. and Mrs. Meese and the appointment of Edwin Thomas, Gretchen Thomas, Tad Thomas, John McKean, Gordon Luce, Edwin Gray, Marc Sandstrom, Clarence Pendletion, and Thomas Barrack to federal jobs.

3. Mr. Meese's and his family's stock trading.

4. Whether Mr. Meese obtained special treatment from government agencies for business entities in which he had a financial interest.

5. Mr. Meese's change of status from the retired Army Reserve to the Active Reserve and his later military promotion.

6. Mr. Meese's statements to the Subcommittee on Human Resources of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, House of Representatives, and the Senate Judiciary Committee, concerning the Carter campaign materials.

7. Mr. Meese's retention of cuff links given to him by the government of South Korea.

8. Mr. Meese's receipt of payments by the Presidential Transition Trust and the Presidential Transition Foundation.

9. Mr. Meese's reporting on his Financial Disclosure Statements of reimbursements for travel expenses.

10. Mrs. Meese's receipt of funds from the William Moss Institute.

11. Mr. Meese's connection, if any, with federal grants to Pepperdine University and American University.

(Source: Report of Independent Counsel, pp. 8-9.)

First, Mr. Meese's failure to include in his Financial Disclosure Statements a $15,000 loan made by Edwin Thomas to Mrs. Messe.

Report of Independent Counsel

In conclusion, we find no substantial evidence of any motive on Mr. Meese's part to conceal the Thomas loan, Mrs. Meese's stock purchases, or any conduct linked to these transactions. In particular, we find no indication of any underlying improper or illegal conduct on the part of the Meeses, and no evidence that they had knowledge of any such conduct by anyone else. * * *

In our view, there being no evidence of motive, that is, no discernible reason why Mr. Meese would need or want to conceal the loan, Mr. Meese's explanation for his failure to list the loan is credible. * * *

Finally, because we found no indication of any underlying imporper or illegal conduct that Mr. Meese might have sought to conceal, prosecution in this case would be inconsistent with Justice Department policy. (pp. 106-107)

Office of Government Ethics

This specific issue was not discussed in the Office of Government Ethics cover letter or working paper.

Second. The relationship, if any, of certain loans made to Mr. and Mrs. Meese and the appointment of Edwin Thomas, Gretchen Thomas, Tad Thomas, John McKean, Gordon Luce, Edwin Gray, Marc Sandstrom, Clarence Pendleton, and Thomas Barrack to federal jobs.

A. EDWIN THOMAS

Report of Independent Counsel

* * * We uncovered no direct evidence linking the offer of the loan, or the subsequent making of the loan, to Mr. Meese's offer of a job [as Assistant Counsellor to the President] to Mr. Thomas.

There is substantial uncontradicted evidence that Mr. Meese's offer of the position to Mr. Thomas was based on the longstanding personal and professional relationship between the two men, rather than any financial transaction between them. * * *

With respect to Mr. Thomas' obtaining a position as Regional Administrator of GSA in San Francisco, the uncontradicted evidence is that Mr. Thomas obtained this position himself, without the knowledge of (or intervention by) Mr. Meese. * * *

Consequently, we conclude that there is no basis for the bringing of a criminal charge against Mr. Meese based on the allegation that he violated federal criminal statutes in connection with Mr. Thomas' obtaining any federal position. (pp. 72-74)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

Our examination of Mr. Meese's activities reveals no violation of the standards of conduct for the Executive Office of the President (3 C.F.R. § 100), which apply to Mr. Meese as Counselor to the President, or Executive Order 11222.

* * * * *

With respect to Mr. Thomas' prosition as Regional Administrator of GSA in San Francisco, the Independent Counsel's report concluded that Mr. Thomas obtained that position himself, without Mr. Meese's knowledge. (working paper, pp. 1-2)

B. GRETCHEN THOMAS

Report of Independent Counsel

* * * There is no evidence that Mr. Meese promised to intervence on Mrs. Thomas' behalf or that he did intervene with respect to either of [the position obtained by her]. Nor is there evidence that Mr. Meese was aware of Ms. Thomas obtaining these positions at the time she did so. Thus, we find no basis for the bringing of a criminal charge with respect to Ms. Thomas' hiring. (p. 74)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

* * * Gretchen Thomas obtained a position as an unpaid intern in the White House Counsel's office in the fall of 1981. In the following summer, she took a job as an attorney-examiner in the San Francisco office of the Merit Systems Protection Board. The evidence reveals that Mr. Meese was unaware that Ms. Thomas was seeking these positions and did not assist her in obtaining them. (working paper, p. 2)

C. TAD THOMAS

Report of Independent Counsel

There is no evidence indicating that Mr. Meese was involved in the hiring of Tad Thomas by the Department of Labor in the fall of 1982. There is no basis for a criminal charge concerning Tad Thomas' hiring. (p. 74)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

* * * [T]here is no evidence that Mr. Meese influenced the Department of Labor's decision to hire Tad Thomas in the fall of 1982. (working paper, p. 2)

D. JOHN MC KEAN

Report of Independent Counsel

We found no evidence that Mr. Meese solicited a loan from Mr. McKean with the express or implied intention of assisting him in obtaining a government position, or that Mr. McKean offered to arrange a loan in the expectation or understanding that Mr. Meese would so assist him.

* * * Furthermore, the loan Mr. McKean arranged appeared to have been an arms-length transaction, and the stated rate of interest was higher than Mr. Meese would have paid had he been able to negotiate a loan from a bank to be secured by a second mortgage on his Virginia home. * * *

* * * [T]here is no evidence that at the time the loan arrangements were made Mr. McKean was interested in or even contemplated a federal position. His actions were consistent with a professional interest in representing his client as a financial manager and accountant. * * *

* * * * *

* * * There is no direct evidence that there was any connection between Mr. McKean's willingness to continue to forego interest until 1983 and Mr. Meese's willingness to support him for a longer term on the Board. There are credible explanations for the actions of both individuals independent of their financial relationship. * * *

Accordingly, we found no basis upon which to recommend the bringing of a criminal against Mr. Meese relating to the McKean loan. (pp. 145-148)

Office of Government Ethics, cover letter

* * * After a series of meetings and discussions which included my Chief Counsel, Donald Campbell; Gary Davis and Nancy Feathers, I concluded that there was no violation of the standards of conduct regarding the forbearance and gift problem, because we determined that since Mr. McKean was the trustee and had not extended the loan, he did not, even in this unique situation, give Mr. Meese a gift. * * *

As regards the McKean appointment, my initial impression was that this was a basis for concern that required further probing. After further examination and factual development, it was my judgment that there was no substance to the appearance problem based on the facts as developed, and, in particular, on the following:

At the time the loans were made, there was not evidence that Mr. McKean was interested in, or even contemplated receiving, a federal position;

Both loans were arms-length transactions at higher than prevailing bank rate interest;

Consideration of Mr. McKean's name was initiated by Mr. Deaver;

Mr. Deaver initiated the nomination of Mr. McKean for a longer term on the Board, at which time the appointment process was already in motion; and

The Independent Counsel's report found no evidence that Mr. Meese spoke to anyone or took any action to assist Mr. McKean in obtaining a longer term.

* * * [T]here existed credible explanations for the actions of both Mr. McKean and Mr. Meese independent of their financial relationships. * * * Mr. Meese had not lost his complete independent or impartiality.

* * * Mr. Meese's objectivity had not been impaired in the McKean matter. (cover letter, p. 2)

Working Paper

Our examination of the facts reveals two probable ethics violations by Mr. Meese. The first, is Mr. Meese's participation in the Senior Staff approval of Mr. McKean for his positions on the Postal Board of Governors. Second, Mr. Meese's acceptance of Mr. McKean's six-month deferral of the interest due on the loans might have violated the restrictions on gifts to federal employees.

* * * * *

Also in the area of gifts is 5 U.S.C. § 7351, which prohibits any federal employee from accepting a gift from any other federal employee receiving less pay than himself.

* * * It is unclear whether this statute was intended to apply only to employees in superior-subordinate relationships or to all employees, regardless of the chain of responsibility. (working paper, pp. 3-5)

E. GORDON LUCE, EDWIN GRAY, MARC SANDSTROM, AND CLARENCE PENDLETON

Report of Independent Counsel

We found no evidence that Mr. Meese solicited or received something of value from Messrs. Luce, Gray, Sandstrom or Pendleton as individuals. The evidence showed, however, that Mr. Meese solicited and received something of value from Great American, the institution with which these individuals were affiliated. Throughout this investigation, the Bank has maintained that its handling of the Meese loans was not unusual for "preferred" customers and was sound from a business point of view. We have corroborated this.

* * * * *

For federal criminal law violations to have occurred, the things of value received by Mr. Meese from the Bank must have been received "in consideration of" a promise of assistance by Mr. Meese in obtaining federal positions for the persons in question (18 U.S.C. § 211) or "because of any official act performed or to be performed by him" (18 U.S.C. § 201).

We conclude that, despite the various degrees of support Mr. Meese gave to the appointments of Messrs. Luce, Gray, Sandstrom, and Pendleton, the evidence does not warrant the finding that such support was connected to the Bank's treatment of the Meeses.

* * * * *

[W]e found no evidence that Messrs. Luce, Gray, Sandstrom, and Pendleton were involved materially, if at all, in the Meeses' financial dealings with the Bank.

* * * * *

[W]e conclude that no basis exists for charging Mr. Meese with federal criminal law violations in connection with the federal appointments of the Great American officials. (pp. 184-187)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

Our examination of the facts leads us to conclude that Mr. Meese did not violate the standards of conduct. Because none of the men had participated in the loans to him, Mr. Meese did not have any favors to return, and there was no conflict of interest. Any action he took on their behalf appears to have been prompted by previous associations with the persons in state government and civic affairs. (working paper, p. 7)

THOMAS BARRACK

Report of Independent Counsel

* * * [T]here was no direct evidence that in any of their meetings or conversations, Mr. Meese promised to support or use his influence on behalf of Mr. Barrack. Nor was there any direct evidence that Mr. Barrack solicited such a promise, or that any promise was communicated, either directly or through Mr. James.

* * * * *

In any event, with respect to the Interior position, the uncontradicted evidence was that Mr. Meese did not in fact contact anyone on Mr. Barrack's behalf and that Mr. Barrack received a position at Interior from Secretary Watt independent of any connection with Mr. Meese. * * * [W]e conclude that Mr. Meese did not violate any federal criminal statute in connection with Mr. Barrack's initial appointment.

We did find that Mr. Meese, in his role as a member of the Senior Staff Personnel Committee, passed on the nomination of Mr. Barrack to be Assistant Secretary for Trade Development in the Commerce Department, a presidential appointment. However, there was no direct evidence that Mr. Meese's non-veto of Mr. Barracks appointment to this job was based upon his earlier receipt of assistance from Mr. Barrack in the sale of the Meeses' California property. * * * There was no evidence that Mr. Meese was involved in Mr. Barrack's securing this job, or that he contacted anyone on Mr. Barrack's behalf in connection with this position.

Accordingly, we conclude that Mr. Meese did not violate any federal criminal statute in connection with Mr. Barrack's recommended appointment to a position at Commerce. (pp. 223-225)

Office of Government Ethics, cover letter

* * * [The authors of the working paper initially] concluded that there was an appearance problem in regard to the proposed appointment of Thomas Barrack to a position in the executive branch, when Mr. Barrack had found purchasers for the Meese residence in California.* * * [I] concluded that, based on the facts, there was not an appearance problem created in the proposed appointment of Thomas Barrack to an executive branch position because Mr. Barrack arranged or found purchasers for the Meese residence based on his belief that it was a good deal for the purchasers. Additionally, Mr. Meese was unaware of any financial involvement by Mr. Barrack. The sale of the Meese residence took place in September, 1982 and Mr. Barrack's appointment was not even considered until February 1983. Based on these facts, it was my judgment that there was not even an appearance problem. (cover letter, pp. 1-2)

Working Paper

Although the Independent Counsel's Report concluded that there were no criminal violations, there is an appearance problem. Section 100.735-4(c) prohibits employees from engaging in activities that might create the appearance of giving preferential treatment or of losing independence or impartiality. (working paper, p. 9)

Third. Mr. Meese's and his family's stock trading.

Report of Independent Counsel

There is no evidence with respect to the purchase and sale of Biotech stock that Mr. or Mrs. Meese received non-public information about the company. We therefore find no basis for any criminal charge in connection with the Biotech stock purchase or sale.

Similarly, there is no evidence that either Mr. or Mrs. Meese received any non-public information about American Cytogenetics.

* * * * *

Therefore, we find no basis for any criminal charge arising out of the purchase or sale by Mrs. Meese of American Cytogenetics.

* * * There is no evidence that Mr. Meese was aware of any benefit that might arguable have flowed from Dr. Brian or his companies to Mrs. Meese. * * *

Hence, we find no basis for any criminal charge against Mr. Meese arising out of his recommendation of Dr. Brian for the NSB. (pp. 243-245)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

We found no ethics violations in our review of the facts. (working paper, p. 14)

Fourth. Whether Mr. Meese obtained special treatment from government agencies for business entities in which he had a finacial interest.

Report of Independent Counsel

The evidence indicates that Questech received no special treatment from the SBA. There is no evidence that Mr. Meese communicated with the SBA concerning the Questech application, nor is there any evidence that anyone communicated with the SBA at the direction of Mr. Meese. (p. 253)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

We conclude from the facts in the Independent Counsel's report that Mr. Meese did not violate any standards of conduct in this situation. (working paper, p. 15)

Fifth. Mr. Meese's change of status from the retired Army Reserve to the Active Reserve and his later military promotion.

Report of independent counsel

Based on [our] findings, we determined that there was no evidence justifying a criminal charge against Mr. Meese.

There is no evidence that Mr. Meese had knowledge that improper actions were being taken to return him to active status in the Army Reserve.

* * * * *

There is no direct evidence that Mr. Meese's recommendation in favor of General Berkman's reappointment was linked to a perception that General Berkman gave him something of value.

We found no direct evidence that Mr. Meese took action favorable to General Berkman in return for something done for Mr. Meese by General Berkman, and no evidence that Mr. Meese had earlier induced favorable treatment by General Berkman with a promise of such action or assistance. Consequently, we conclude that there is no basis for a criminal charge against Mr. Meese arising out of these matters. (pp. 279-280)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

Our review of the facts fails to uncover any standards of conduct violation under 3 C.F.R. § 100 735-4.

With respect to General Berkman's appointment, Mr. Meese did not violate the standards of conduct. Although initially Mr. Meese's actions could create an appearance of using his White House position for private gain, the facts demonstrate that there was no actual impropriety. (working paper, p. 11)

Sixth. Mr. Meese's statement to the Subcommittee on Human Resources of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, House of Representatives, and the Senate Judiciary Committee, concerning Carter campaign materials.

Report of Independent Counsel

* * * The evidence developed in the two previous investigations into this matter, and in our own investigation, does not support a conclusion that Mr. Meese's statements to the committees were untrue.

* * * There is no basis for prosecuting Mr. Meese for federal criminal law violations in connection with the acquisition by the Reagan/Bush campaign of Carter materials or in connection with his statements on the subject to the Congressional committees. (pp. 337-338)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

The Independent Counsel's report noted no evidence of criminal law violation by Mr. Meese with respect to his statement to the Congressional committees concerning the Carter briefing papers. Our review of the facts fails to uncover any standards of conduct violations by Mr. Meese in this area. (working paper, p. 12)

Seventh. Mr. Meese's retention of cuff links given to him by the government of South Korea.

Report of Independent Counsel

The * * * facts and circumstance suggest that Mr. Meese's failure to surrender the cuff links was based on his good faith belief that the value of the cuff links was within acceptable limits. There is no basis for a criminal prosecution. (pp. 372-373)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

* * * Because [Mr. Meese] did not violate 5 U.S.C. § 7342, we do not find a violation under the standards of conduct at § 100.735-14(d), which use § 7342 as their standard for gifts from foreign governments. (working paper, p. 17)

Eighth. Mr. Meese's receipt of payments by the Presidential Transition Trust and the Presidential Transition Foundation.

Report of Independent Counsel

* * * [W]e do not believe a violation of § 209 by Mr. Meese could be established, even if § 209 were construed to forbid payment of moving expenses by an organization such as the Trust, to Mr. Meese.

Mr. Meese testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee that he paid his own moving expenses * * *. [W]e do not believe Mr. Meese's testimony has been contradicted by the payment to Mr. Meese from the Trust. (pp. 350-351)

* * * * *

Both the monthly consulting fees and the rent payments [paid by the Presidential Transition Trust] appear to be legitimate compensation for services Mr. Meese performed for the transition effort. These payments were reported properly by Mr. Meese for tax purposes and were disclosed on his Financial Disclosure Forms. * * * During this period, he received no pay from the federal government and he was not a federal employee. The consulting payments * * * were not an illegal supplement of his federal salary under section 209. (pp. 252-253)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

Our review of the Independent Counsel's report fails to reveal any violation of 3 C.F.R. § 100.735-13, which prohibits supplementation of a federal employee's salary as compensation for his federal service. We concur with the Independent Counsel's conclusion, based on the facts he presented, that the monthly consulting fees and the rent payments appear to be legitimate compensation for services Mr. Meese performed for the transition effort. (working paper, p. 13)

Ninth. Mr. Meese's reporting on his Financial Disclosure Statements of reimbursements for travel expenses.

Report of Independent Counsel

* * * [W]e discern no motive Mr. Meese or his staff could have had for wanting to conceal the reimbursements in question by failing to report them. * * * [W]e conclude that Mr. Meese's failure to disclose certain travel-related expenditures on Financial Disclosure Forms for May of 1982 and 1983 was not "willful" and there is no basis for a criminal prosecution. (p. 362)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

Given the facts set forth in the report, we concur in the Independent Counsel's conclusion that Mr. Meese's failure to disclose certain travel-related expenditures was not "willful". Therefore, there is no basis for a * * * standards of conduct violation. (working paper, p. 15)

Tenth. Mrs. Meese's receipt of funds from the William Moss Institute.

Report of Independent Counsel

* * * Neither Mr. Moss, whose donations served to underwrite Mrs. Meese's salary, nor any member of Mr. Moss' family, has been considered for government office or received government contracts during Mr. Meese's tenure in office. Neither Mr. nor Mrs. Meese played a role with respect to the tax exemption granted the William Moss Institute. Thus, there is no basis for criminal prosecution of Mr. Meese.

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

* * * [W]e find no basis for any standards of conduct violations. (working paper, p. 16)

Eleventh. Mr. Meese's connection, if any, with federal grants to Pepperdine University and American University.

Report of Independent Counsel

There is no evidence to support the allegation that Mr. and Mrs. Meese intervened to obtain federal grants for Pepperdine University and American University. (p. 378)

Office of Government Ethics, working paper

* * * [W]e find no violation of the standards of conduct. (working paper, p. 17)

ULTIMATE CONCLUSIONS

Report of Independent Counsel

Based upon [our] investigation * * *, we find no basis with respect to any of the eleven allegations for the bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese for the violation of a federal criminal statute. (p. 11)

Office of Government Ethics

* * * Mr. Meese is in compliance with applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest. (Letter from David Martin, Director of the Office of Government Ethics, dated January 24, 1985, to Senator Strom Thurmond, Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.)

Mr. HATCH. In addition, I would like to place in the RECORD at this point the text of my introductory committee statement on the nomination of Edwin Meese as Attorney General, as well as two additional items relating to the concept of "appearance of impropriety." The first is an excerpt from the Annotated Code of Professional Responsibility for Lawyers relating to the concept of "appearance of impropriety" as an appropriate ethical standard. The second is an excerpt from the Judiciary Committee hearing on January 31, 1985, in which I addressed a series of questions to Mr. David Martin, the Director of the Office of Government Ethics, on the "appearance of impropriety" standard. In my own opinion, this exchange makes clear the extent to which this is a vague and directionless concept with great potential for tarnishing the reputations of honest and decent individuals. While the "appearance of impropriety" may well suggest the occurrence of actual impropriety, where it does not do so—as in the case of Mr. Meese—it is an inappropriate standard by which to judge a person's actions.

I ask unanimous consent that the items I have mentioned be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Feb. 4, 1985]

"FEW OF US COULD MEET THIS STANDARD"

Mr. Chairman, I wish to welcome Mr. Meese again to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. Although I am certain that Mr. Meese has amply enjoyed the continued company of each of us on this panel, I would hope that we would now move with expedition to process his nomination. I believe that Mr. Meese is a man of character, a man of professional competence, and a man of integrity. He will serve his country with distinction as attorney general of the United States.

There is little that I can add to the statements of Sens. Thurmond and Laxalt, but I would like to be permitted a few general observations on this whole affair. In particular, I would like to briefly comment on the significance of the report of the independent counsel. We have all heard it said that the report is not particularly relevant to the present hearings—that the report has found "merely" that Mr. Meese is not a criminal and that this is not a sufficient recommendation for attorney general.

REPORT'S REAL MEANING

Of course, it is not enough that a nominee for attorney general is not indictable. However, the report of the independent counsel is of critical importance for reasons that go far beyond the question of criminal conduct. To downgrade the significance of the counsel's report is to distort its real meaning.

The investigation by the special counsel was triggered by a perception among some members of this committee that there were unanswered questions about details of Mr. Meese's conduct as counselor to the president. If explained one way, they would give rise to issues of criminal or ethical character. If explained differently, they would be purely innocent. It has been the charge of the special counsel, not merely to determine whether Mr. Meese was indictable, but to determine the facts of his conduct.

In the course of carrying out its mandate, the special counsel has accomplished a great deal that is useful and instructive to this committee. First, he has explicitly concluded that Mr. Meese did nothing of a criminal character, nothing that warranted an indictment. Second, in so doing, he has made necessary findings which exculpate Mr. Meese from even many of the allegations of unethical conduct. If, for example, Mr. Meese had traded in governmental employment for personal favors, he not only would have been acting in a manner inconsistent with proper standards of conduct, but he would have been in violation of section 201 or 211 of the criminal code. Mr. Meese, thus, has been found by the special counsel not merely to be innocent of criminal wrongdoing but at the same time to have been free of any related ethical breach.

I understand, of course, that the counsel has refused—properly refused—to offer conclusory observations on the ethical behavior of Mr. Meese. He has done so indirectly, however, in the course of many of his conclusions about Mr. Meese's compliance with federal law.

Finally, the special prosecutor has made substantial contribution. He has laid out the facts in a clear and thorough manner for this committee. He has described for us what took place in the dealings by Mr. Meese which are in controversy. He has set forth for details for us to consider and assess.

What are we left with then as the substance of the case against Mr. Meese? He has been exonerated of criminal misconduct. He has indirectly been exonerated by the counsel of the most serious breaches of ethical wrongdoing. Even Mr. Meese's friends at Common Cause have responded to the final report by conceding that "Mr. Meese may have intended no wrong."

Indeed, there is absolutely no evidence that Mr. Meese did intend to do wrong. There is no evidence for this in the counsel's report; there is no evidence in our prior hearings; and there is no evidence in the testimony by the various groups before us today. There is not merely an absence of a smoking gun; there is not even a hint of gunsmoke.

What we are left with is simply that Mr. Meese has not satisfied, in the minds of some, the obligation to avoid even the "appearance" of misconduct. This accusation has apparently become the last refuge for those who are determined to assassinate a good man's character. Never mind the facts, let's concentrate instead on "appearances."

Because there were members of this committee who initially believed there to be a potential "appearance" of misconduct, we authorized the actions of the special counsel. It was either to confirm or to allay this "appearance" of misconduct that the investigation was launched. Whatever the "appearance" to some of misconduct, the counsel concluded that, in fact, there was no actual misconduct. Read the report. He investigated the circumstances of Mr. Meese's conduct and concluded that, whatever "appearance" of misconduct there may have been in the first place, it had been adequately explained in a reasonable way.

What Common Cause and others are now saying is that, although we cannot point to evidence of actual misconduct, Mr. Meese acted wrongly in even giving rise to an "appearance" of misconduct. Of course, even this is not true. There are many members of this committee, including myself, who were never persuaded that Mr. Meese's conduct "appeared" to be improper. We never believed it particularly suggestive that individuals are likely to be favorably disposed toward helping their friends where possible. Following the counsel's report, we are even less comfortable in acknowledging any "appearance" of impropriety.

When Common Cause is saying is that the standard is not merely going to be whether there is a mere "appearance" of improper conduct but that such "appearance" is to be ascertained by those individuals or organizations that are most suspicious, most skeptical, and least trusting of the good faith of the individual in question. It is an absurd and grotesque standard. It is a standard that few of us in this body could satisfy. We could not satisfy it if we ever accepted a campaign contribution from a business or labor organization whose interests we subsequently promoted with a roll-call vote; we could not satisfy it if we ever hired a friend in our office or assisted one in wending his way through the bureaucracy; we could not satisfy it in a 1,001 other ways, and I think everyone up here knows it.

Let us make no mistake about it. The standard that Common Cause would have us employ is not merely unworkable—which it is—but violates fundamental concepts of due process and fairness. I have no doubt about that. Mr. Meese has been found to violate no rule of law; he has been found to violate no precept of ethical conduct; those of his actions which are susceptible to ambiguous interpretation have been explained favorably to Mr. Meese. Read the report. All that we are left with is the view of some observers, certainly not all or even many, that Mr. Meese has been insufficiently cautious in avoiding the "appearance" of impropriety. Never mind that the reality of the conduct has been explained. For me, the integrity of Common Cause's case is adequately summed up by their fascinating statement about Mr. Meese—"whatever his subjective motive, Mr. Meese did link by his actions the loan and the job." Whatever his subjective motivation! It used to be that this little detail of "subjective motivation" was the linchpin of the investigative process.

Thus, the reputation of Mr. Meese is ultimately to be left to the interpretation of those least disposed to believing explanations of his innocence. Mind you, we are not referring to their judgment on the fundamental question of guilt or innocence, but rather to their judgment of the exotic question of the "appearance" of guilt or innocence. Caesar's wife could not have satisfied this test, much less any one of the rest of us who are occasionally embroiled in the grit of day-to-day politics.

Mr. Chairman, what we see here is the anatomy of a scandal in search of itself. Common Cause seeks to cloak its antipathy for the kind of conservative causes championed by Mr. Meese in procedural garb. We have seen a succession of efforts to twist stray, innocent facts into a grand jury case. If the gift of Korean rings doesn't fly, let's try "debate-gate"; if not that, then insider-trading; if not that, then perhaps the "appearance" of impropriety can be run up the flagpole. No serious case has yet been made.

SUFFERED SUBSTANTIAL LOSSES

The Wall Street Journal has described this process as a lesson in how to effectively quash political enemies in three easy steps—"raise accusations, damage reputations, and ignore vindications." In conclusion, let me place one further bit of perspective on Mr. Meese's situation. As an indisputed result of his financial dealings in question here, he has incurred no great wealth; in fact, he has incurred no wealth whatsoever and, indeed, has suffered substantial losses. These are losses directly attributable to his public service in counseling the president of the United States. Mr. Meese has cheated no one; he has lied to no one; he has defaulted on none of his obligations; and he has come out of his dealings a poorer man than when he began. Considerably poorer.

The nomination of Mr. Meese as attorney general deserves to go ahead expeditiously. There is not simply an absence of evidence that would cast a shadow upon Mr. Meese; there is, in addition, a wealth of evidence that would suggest that he is well-equipped to serve his country with honor and distinction.

TEXTUAL AND HISTORICAL NOTES

The material contained in current EC 9-1 was subject to minor changes during the drafting process. The third sentence of current EC 9-2 reads: "In order to avoid misunderstandings and hence to maintain confidence, a lawyer should fully and promptly inform his client of material developments in the matters being handled for the client." This sentence was added in the final draft of July 1969. In the same draft, the material contained in EC 9-4 of the preliminary draft (January 1969) was reworded, amplified, and renumbered EC 9-6.

John F. Sutton, Jr., reporter for the drafting committee, has stated that some interpreters of Canon 9 have radically misunderstood the purpose of the Canon; they have assumed that there is a rule in the Canon that states that a lawyer should avoid the appearance of impropriety, but there actually is no such rule (Transcript of Interview with John F. Sutton, Jr., by Olavi Maru, Dec. 20, 1976, Houston, p. 83 (on file at American Bar Foundation, Chicago)). Sutton noted that the committee intended for the last Canon to provide the lawyer with guidance about what to do in situations not discussed in the first eight Canons. He stressed, however, that the lawyer's duty to avoid the appearance of professional impropriety was of a much lower order than the duties specified in the other provisions of the Code:

"If a lawyer has a duty to a court, or to a client or to some one else, the lawyer ought to take action to meet that duty even if his conduct will be misunderstood. Only where there's no real guidance and no other interest to be served should a lawyer act on the possibility of appearance. If there's no other guidance anywhere in the Code, then the lawyer looks to Canon 9 and does what makes the professional look best; however, the lawyer should not let the Canon 9 stand in his way in doing what's proper under other canons and DR's."

Transcript of Interview with John F. Sutton, Jr., by Olavi Maru, Dec. 20, 1976, Houston, p. 83 (on file at American Bar Foundation, Chicago). Sutton also stated that the drafting committee thought that there were situations in which the appearance of impropriety became so important that such situations should be mentioned specifically the Disciplinary Rules. The Committee conceived of three such instances and set forth rules to govern the lawyer's conduct in these situations in DR 9-101 (A), (B), and (C). ("[W]e carved out three specifics and in effect said: these are the only three situations where you must act—where you are required to act—to avoid the appearance of impropriety" (id., p. 85).)

Formal Opinion 342, November 24, 1975, interprets DR 9-101(B). In this Opinion, the Committee stated that " 'appearance of professional impropriety' is not a standard, test or element embodied in DR 9-101(B)" but rather "is a policy consideration supporting the existence of the Disciplinary Rule." The Committee also noted that "[t]he appearance of evil is only one" of the considerations underlying the rule and that it "is probably not the most important reason for the creation and existence of the rule itself." In Formal Opinion 342 (n.17), the Committee states:

"Perhaps the least helpful of the seven policy considerations mentioned above is that of avoiding the appearance of impropriety. This consideration appears in the heading of Canon 9 and is developed more fully in EC 9-2 and 9-3, thereby giving guidance to lawyers when making decisions of conscience in regard to their professional responsibility. Thus, 'avoiding the appearance of evil' is relevant to our task of interpreting DR 9-101(B), even though it is not relevant when a grievance committee or court is determining whether a violation of the standard of DR 9-101(B) has in fact occurred. It is fortunate that 'avoiding even the appearance of professional impropriety' was not made an element of the disciplinary rule, for it is too vague a phrase to be useful [citations omitted], and lawyers will differ as to what constitutes the appearance of evil [citations omitted]. For the same reasons, the concept is of limited assistance as an underlying policy consideration. If 'appearance of professional impropriety' had been included as an element in the disciplinary rule, it is likely that the determination of whether particular conduct violated a rule would have degenerated from the determination of the fact issues specified by the rule into a determination on an instinctive, ad hoc or even ad hominem basis [citation omitted]."

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE HEARING (JANUARY 31, 1985)

Senator HATCH. Let me ask you a question, Mr. Martin. I think it is important to understand your standards here. Suppose a member of a legislative body, the U.S. Senate, for example, received a PAC contribution from a business or labor interest and subsequently casted a vote beneficial to that interest. Would this also constitute an "appearance of impropriety" problem?

Mr. MARTIN. In my view it would. The Senator has done nothing wrong. He has done nothing unethical or improper, but it would tend to raise an appearance problem.

Senator HATCH. So under the standard that you have described here today that would constitute an "appearance" problem even though there was absolutely no intent to do anything wrong.

Mr. MARTIN. That is right.

* * * * *

Senator HATCH. What about this: Suppose a Member of Congress accepts a job upon departure from office from a business enterprise whose interests he voted in favor of during the time he was in office. Would that constitute an "appearance" problem?

Mr. MARTIN. I believe it would.

Senator HATCH. Under your standard?

Mr. MARTIN. Sure. Probably a criminal violation as well.

Senator HATCH. What if a Member of Congress invests in stock whose interests are potentially affected by his or her committee actions or votes? Is that an "appearance" problem?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, it is.

Senator HATCH. What if a Member of Congress assists an individual constituent of his or hers who has contributed to a recent campaign, maybe assists them in getting a Federal job or a Federal contract? Would that constitute an appearance problem?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, I think it probably would.

Senator HATCH. In other words, under the standard you have discussed here——

Mr. MARTIN. It would raise an appearance under this.

Senator HATCH. What if a Member of Congress accepts an honorarium for a speech before a trade association which has interests which may be affected by a committee that he or she sits on?

Mr. MARTIN. That clearly raises a problem.

Senator HATCH. Again, an "appearance" problem, not illegal, not wrong, but an "appearance" problem. Is that correct?

Mr. MARTIN. That's correct.

Senator HATCH. What if a Member of Congress accepts a dinner or Christmas basket from a business which is affected by decisions made by his or her committee? Could that be an "appearance" problem?

Mr. MARTIN. It could.

* * * * *

Senator HATCH. What about a Member of Congress who assists in the appointment to public office of a constituent who happened to have made a campaign contribution to him or her?

Mr. MARTIN. That certainly could.

Senator HATCH. That also might constitute an "appearance" problem under your standard.

Mr. MARTIN. It may.

Senator HATCH. Or secures an ambassadorship for a campaign contributor or a personal friend? All of these things happen around here. I mean, I just want people to realize that it is nice to sit back and judge any human being who comes up for a position in government, but you could find fault with almost everybody if all that is wrong is an "appearance" problem.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, that is why it is so important for us to go behind an appearance and it is so important for the public and I think for the newspaper to realize they really ought to look behind an appearance before they print a headline that is saying there is an appearance problem because reputations are destroyed in the ethics area or tarnished and that is why we really insist on having our facts straight and our judgments clear.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I express my appreciation to my colleague from Wisconsin who has been good enough to permit me to take the floor at this point.

Mr. President, we meet today to consider the nomination of Edwin Meese to serve as Attorney General of the United States.

The individual who occupies that Office is the guardian of a 200-year ideal—that our Nation is a government of laws, not of men. We uphold that ideal through a legal system founded on the principle that all men and women are equal under the law. These two simple concepts represent the soul of our democracy.

Over the years, when our faith in our system has been tested by the weakness of men and the strain of events, history has brought forth individuals whose finely honed sense of law and ethics led them to elevate constitutional principles above personal ambition and self interest.

Elliot Richardson and William Ruckleshaus resigned as Attorneys General rather than yield to President Nixon's effort to subvert the law;

Attorney General William Rogers ordered U.S. marshals to Little Rock to enforce civil rights laws over the objections of defiant State officials;

Attorney General Nicholas DeB Katzenbach quashed the FBI's program of illegal wiretapping of American citizens.

Attorney General Herbert Brownell resisted enormous political pressure from within the Eisenhower administration to support a bipartisan drive to enact this country's first civil rights bill in 100 years.

These men set a standard of legal excellence and personal courage. They challenged their own popular President and they challenged the country to reach beyond the narrow confines of ideology. In each case their actions helped restore a nation's trust in its leaders.

These types of men, men with uncommon sensitivity to our most basic values, are the kind of individuals we have come to expect as Attorney General.

The Attorney General must be a person who establishes a standard of conduct, who leads by example. The Attorney General must be someone who commands trust, not someone who comes to the job lacking that trust and who must develop it on the job.

I do not believe that Edwin Meese commands the public trust essential for the person serving as Attorney General of the United States. Accordingly, I urge the Senate to reject this nomination.

Some have said that we should confirm Mr. Meese because he is the choice of the President and therefore we should give him the benefit of the doubt.

But I believe that when there are serious doubts, we should not vote to confirm. We should not trifle with the public trust. There is already too much doubt and cynicism about our leaders. We cannot afford to compromise our ideals for they are far too important and the public confidence in their execution is far too fragile.

In deciding how to vote on this matter, each of us has an obligation to judge Mr. Meese with care. We must ask if he has the breadth of legal knowledge, the ethical sensitivity and the social compassion that the Office of Attorney General demands. When all is said and done, we must measure Edwin Meese's conduct against our own sense of what is right and proper.

Ask yourself what you would do if an individual gave you an unsecured $60,000 loan, with interest deferred for 1 year, and then that individual appeared before your committee to be confirmed to a high Federal position. Would not warning bells go off? Would you not, at the very least, advise your colleagues of a potential conflict, if not actually recuse yourself from passing on the nominee?

Ask yourself what you would do if, a few weeks after your election, a foundation gave you $10,000 to help cover your move to Washington and you subsequently learned that the payment was probably illegal. You would not keep the money and ask foundation officials to alter the records to call the payment something else. Instead, would you not consider returning the money?

Ask yourself what you would do if you learned that the Army broke numerous rules and regulations to secure your promotion in the Reserves. You would not keep it under those circumstances.

These situations exactly parallel those faced by Ed Meese. But in each case, and numerous others like them, he totally failed to see that they posed genuine ethical problems.

Ask yourself how you would have acted in these cases and compare that with how Ed Meese acted. That should be the basis for your vote today or tomorrow or whenever this body gets to the actual vote.

Some would argue that individually, each of Edwin Meese's ethical lapses was minor, that he had no willful intent to violate the law nor White House ethical standards. I could agree with these views. But that still would not change the central point. Each incident, each act or failure to act, in and of itself may not provide a basis for disqualifying Mr. Meese. But added together, they paint a picture of a man who lacks the sensitivity to ethical propriety required of the Attorney General.

Mr. Meese has said he would act differently knowing what he knows today, but not because he believes his actions were wrong. How can we expect him to make better judgments next time when he fails to appreciate the impropriety of his past conduct?

Indeed, time and time again, Mr. Meese has chosen to defend his conduct on narrow or technical grounds, rather than demonstrate sensitivity to the larger issues at stake. It is his consistent failure to see beyond the specific facts at issue to these larger questions that I find so troubling.

Senator BIDEN pressed him to explain why, after receiving $60,000 in loans from Mr. McKean, he did not disclose his financial relationship when Mr. McKean's name came before the senior White House staff for appointment to the Postal Board of Governors.

Mr. Meese replied that the senior staff meeting was an informal meeting and no votes were taken. What difference does it make whether it was a formal or an informal meeting? The fact is that the individuals involved had the clear power to give or deny the appointment to John McKean.

Senator DECONCINI and others pressed Mr. Meese to explain why he had accepted and retained his Army promotion once he learned that the rules were violated to secure it and that he was being treated more favorably than nearly 2,000 other qualified officers. He responded that he was technically qualified and, even though a shortcut was taken, he deserved the promotion.

But what difference does it make whether he was technically qualified? Perhaps he would have, in the normal course of events, received the promotion. But the fact is that the rules were broken. The fact is that he had knowledge of that special treatment. Yet, rather than give up the promotion, he stands before us and defends it on narrow technical grounds.

Several committee members asked him to explain why his relationship with Mr. McKean did not constitute a conflict of interest. He replied that Mr. McKean was only the trustee for the $60,000 loan, not the actual source of funds.

What difference does it make whether Mr. McKean was the trustee or the source? The fact is Mr. McKean arranged the original loan, he negotiated the terms, he set the interest rate, and he was intimately involved in every decision regarding it. Yet Mr. Meese ignores these facts in favor of doing another rhetorical tapdance.

He was asked to explain why his nomination does not run counter to the recommendation of the Watergate Special Prosecution Force that a President should not nominate as Attorney General his campaign manager or someone who has served "in a similar high level campaign role."

He replied that his role in the 1980 campaign was limited to policy development, that he was not involved in day-to-day campaign decisions.

What difference does it make if he was involved in day-to-day decisions? What difference does it make if he actually counted delegates? The fact is he was second in command of the campaign.

The concern of the Watergate Task Force was to depoliticize the Office of the Attorney General, to make it the province of legal professionals, not political operatives. Mr. Meese is truly splitting hairs when he stands before us and describes his role as a policy analyst, not someone dealing with the leaders of the Reagan campaign.

It is also worth noting that in May 1976, the Senate thought that the Watergate Task Force proposal made a lot of sense. In fact, it made so much sense that this body unanimously adopted an amendment barring the appointment as Attorney General of any individual "who has held a high level position of trust and responsibility while serving on the national personal campaign staff or in an organization or political party working on behalf of the national campaign of an individual who was elected to the office of President or Vice President."

Has something happened to cause the Senate to reconsider this eminently sensible prohibition? Or is it simply that the President wants Ed Meese and the Senate will abandon an important principle to give Mr. Reagan what he wants?

Ultimately, I find it difficult to be comfortable with Mr. Meese's commitment to follow a higher standard in the future. He is a man who seeks to defend his prior conduct at every turn rather than acknowledge its fundamental impropriety. His intense focus on narrow issues blinds him to larger, more basic issues.

Mr. President, I want to address myself to one other issue that has been raised during this confirmation process. For while the immediate focus of our debate has been Mr. Meese's qualifications for the office, a deeper and more enduring issue has also emerged.

This issue involves the people's confidence in the integrity of our Government and our leaders. That confidence is at an all-time low.

A government of laws only functions if those governed believe that the laws are being fairly enforced. There is no room for bowing to the privileged few, no room for self-serving decisions. For in the final analysis, the motivation for all Americans to act within the law stems at heart from the knowledge that the laws are being fairly and impartially administered.

If our faith in that principle is eroded by exposure to patterns of actual or perceived impropriety by public officials, then the motivation to act within the law is likewise eroded.

It is said that the treatment Mr. Meese has received will discourage honorable men and women from serving in public life, that the post-Watergate ethics mentality has gone too far.

I reject these statements.

Many qualified and successful Americans want to serve in public life, not for personal fame nor for enrichment, but because they understand that if a democracy is to function some individuals must subordinate their personal ambition to the common good.

To suggest, as some have, that rigorous ethical standards will somehow disqualify and discourage gifted persons from a life of public service is a profoundly cynical view. To be sure, some may shy away from service to avoid the spotlight that must be directed at public officials. But the reservoir of talent is deep. And many Americans will want to serve as long as they believe that public service will be viewed as an honorable calling and that their service will enhance their stature in the eyes of their peers.

It is only if they come to believe that public service will diminish their stature that qualified men and women will avoid it. We risk losing persons to public life not when we demand persons of ethical probity, but when we fail to demand persons of ethical probity.

I want to emphasize one additional point. Obviously, there is no proscription against Mr. Meese or any other public official accepting financial assistance from friends.

What is proscribed is, once having received assistance, acting in a way that compromises, or appears to compromise, one's independence and impartiality.

Ed Meese should understand that the concerns about him relate not to his receipt of financial favors from friends, but how he acted toward these individuals after they came to his aid.

Mr. Meese's nomination has been challenged not because he is a man of modest means, but because, having pursued and received assistance to ease his financial plight, he then failed to segregate his public obligations from his personal relationships.

Every 6 years, the performance and conduct of each Member of this body is judged by those we represent, when it comes to Cabinet officials and other nominees, though, we are the electorate, we are the ones who must vote "aye" or "nay."

With our jobs comes the obligation, enshrined in the Constitution, to seek the highest standards for the Attorney General and for other Presidential appointees subject to confirmation. If we do not exercise that obligation then we will not grow as individuals, nor as an institution.

We must strive to find individuals who have demonstrated a consistent pattern of sound judgment and ethical sensitivity.

We must seek the highest standard possible in the Attorney General of the United States.

The vote we will cast on this nomination is not just another vote to confirm or reject a Presidential nominee, it is not an ideological vote, nor a vote that should be determined by party loyalty. And I wish to reemphasize that. It is not a vote that should be determined by party loyalty. It will be a vote which will have repercussions for years to come. For we must understand that faith in the law and faith in those who execute it are the inseparable bedrocks of our democratic system.

In the end, it is up to us, and us alone, to maintain, indeed, to strengthen public confidence in our officials and our system. That is what is at stake today in this nomination. Confirming Edwin Meese as Attorney General will lessen public trust in our Government and therefore I will vote "nay."

"NO" ON THE MEESE NOMINATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, when the roll is called on the nomination of Edwin Meese to be Attorney General of the United States, I shall cast a "no" vote.

There are many reasons why Senators can and should oppose the Meese nomination. Here are the ones that I find most persuasive.

First, what does the United States of America need in an Attorney General? The Attorney General is the top man, the leader, the head of the U.S. Department of Justice.

Now hold that a minute and dwell on it. The head man, the leader of the Department of Justice.

Now ask yourself: What makes the United States the unique and great country it is? Is it our wealth? No; true, we are uniquely wealthy—the wealthiest country in the world. That is reason to be proud and grateful. But it is not the great distinction of the United States that we have far more of the material wealth of the world than any other country on Earth.

It is not our rich natural resources. It is not our competitive capitalist system, although most of us enjoy that aspect of America and believe that we have the best economic system in the world.

What is the most critical distinction that makes America America? It is our freedom. It is the expression of that freedom in our Constitution. It is our Bill of Rights. It is the fact that you or I or any other American can get up any time, any place, and criticize any institution or person or combination of persons—no matter how powerful or popular they may be—and be protected by the Constitution in doing so.

CRITICISM OFTEN WRONG

That criticism is often vicious, mean, and absolutely wrong. It may come from Communists or Fascists or atheists. Of course, sometimes the criticism is right and the powerful people who occupy our highest public offices are wrong. But unlike countries that operate with totalitarian regimes of the left or right, we protect the most strident and wrongheaded as well as the positive and reasoned critic.

What has all this got to do with the confirmation of Ed Meese to be Attorney General? The answer is everything: the Attorney General of the United States, the head of our country's Department of Justice, should be the champion of constitutional rights for all Americans, Including Americans who denounce our country and the policies of its leaders.

The Attorney General of the United States should appreciate the special importance for our country of the American Civil Liberties Union. Few Americans who have followed the ACLU have not, at one time or another, been offended—and, in the case of this Senator, often been offended—by the kind of people the American Civil Liberties Union has gone to court to defend: the knee-jerk Communists and Nazis, the assorted ill-informed and ignorant extremists of the far right or far left.

The ACLU, to its everlasting credit, has consistently defended these critics of our country when they have gotten into legal trouble. Yet, Edwin Meese, the President's nominee for Attorney General, has denounced the ACLU as part of the criminals' lobby in this country.

Let me repeat that: Edwin Meese has denounced the ACLU as part of the criminals' lobby in our country.

There is one organization that could not last 5 minutes in the Soviet Union. It could not last in any totalitarian country. But it is one of the most distinctive aspects of this country that we not only permit the ACLU to operate but that we do our best to champion it because, as I say, it does express the essence of what makes this country unique.

FREE SPEECH OUR HALLMARK

There is no way this great country, with its sacred commitment to freedom of speech as the true hallmark of our country, can justify elevating a person to be our Attorney General, the head of our Department of Justice, who has shown this appalling misunderstanding of the American Civil Liberties Union struggle for freedom in its constant defense of the right of every person to speak freely.

As Justice Holmes said, the real test of freedom of speech is the freedom we afford to those who speak the words we hate. No freedom in America better illustrates the immortal words of Voltaire: "I disagree with everything you say, but I will fight to the death for your right to say it."

Justice Holmes would have had a lot of trouble with this nomination of Ed Meese for Attorney General. So would Voltaire and so should the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, the clearly expressed attitude of the nominee against the American Civil Liberties is just one—albeit a very important one—of my reasons for opposing Mr. Meese.

My prime reason for voting against Mr. Meese is not exciting or elevating. It is plain and pedestrian. And it should be obvious to any Senator who will take 30 seconds to think about it. Edwin Meese is simply not qualified to be the Attorney General of the United States.

When you or I hire an administrative assistant or a typist, we have a simple criterion. Is the applicant for the job the best qualified person we can hire? And just think of the time and energy that goes into selecting a university president, a corporation chief executive officer, or for that matter, a head coach of a National Football League football team. Search committees are formed. A number of candidates are interviewed. Years of experience and a winning track record are required. When the top man is finally picked, those who select him feel certain he can do the job and do it well.

But somehow when a President of the United States picks a Cabinet officer, he frequently selects a crony with no qualifications other than that the President likes him and the crony wants the job. Consider the fact that none of those positions to which I have referred in the private sector have nearly the power or influence in our lives in this country that our top Government jobs have. And yet, over and over again, we in the Senate ignore our constitutional responsibility to advise and consent to the President's nomination for the top offices in our Government. We mindlessly rubber stamp anyone any President selects. Unless we can catch the nominee with both hands in the cash register, he or she is in.

MEAGER LEGAL EXPERIENCE

Edwin Meese's only significant legal experience came during his 8 years in the Alameda County District Attorney's office, where he ultimately became deputy district attorney. Mr. Meese left that job in 1966 to spend 2 years as Governor Reagan's legal secretary on clemency and extradition. Since that time, Meese's total and longstanding professional identification has been with President Reagan's political career. And despite the fact that Meese's inept administrative skills are frequently noted by friends and foes alike, he is being nominated to head the biggest law office on the face of the Earth, with supervision over more than 60,000 employees.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand here a list of more than 1,000 lawyers who should be considered as this country's Attorney General ahead of Edwin Meese.

In my judgment, if an objective analysis were made of this list with the name of Mr. Meese and the other 1,189 names attached—it will take me just a minute to lay it out here; these are the names of the people who without question are better qualified to head the Department of Justice and be the Attorney General of the United States than Mr. Meese.

That is only a partial list, but here are those names, Mr. President.

Now, I say that not with any reference to ethical problems but simply on the basis of competence. On the basis of competence this nomination should be rejected. I say that competence can only come from relevant experience.

The list is not infallible. I have, in fact, already removed one name from the original list, based on developments that occurred since the compilation was made.

But my point is this: A responsible search for the person to fill the position of Attorney General of the United States should be broadbased and thorough. Perhaps there is not the time or resources to examine carefully over 1,000 names.

But a fair consideration of the wide range of available legal talent and experience is not too much to ask. A list of the kind that I have prepared would be a good place to start.

I should point out, by the way, that to avoid any accusation of pushing personal cronies, I have included no one from Wisconsin on my list. Had I done so, I could have easily expanded this list from my own personal knowledge to 2,000 or more.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the list of lawyers to which I have been referring be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, what does this list disclose? It discloses that every Senator in this body has at least six constituents better qualified by recognized experts of performance and experience than the man we are asked to confirm today.

In the State of Washington, for instance, I have 14 from the State of the Presiding Officer. From the State of the manager of the bill, South Carolina, I have 12 names listed here who would be better qualified. From the State of Ohio, that great State, I have 36 names of people who are better qualified.

And I have offered the names, States and status of each of these better qualified lawyers. Some are distinguished practitioners. Some are U.S. attorneys. Some serve as Federal judges, some as State judges. Some have won special distinction as legal scholars, some as bar officials. Some serve as the attorney general of their State. Some have won recognition and respect as corporate counsel or as labor counsel. Every one of the 1,181 whose names, States and status I list deserve consideration before this nominee from Alameda County, CA, whose law career has not won distinction. If the President is intent on picking a Californian to serve in this critical Office of Attorney General he could have picked from the list I hold in my hand—or I have laid down here on the floor—of 34 distinguished California practitioners, 4 U.S. attorneys, 8 Federal judges, an outstanding State judge, 15 celebrated legal scholars, 3 bar officials, a top flight attorney general or 4 leading corporate counsels. Any one of these 70 California would in all likelihood bring more ability, experience and distinction to the top legal office in this country than Edwin Meese. From Pennsylvania, I list 53 persons of obviously greater distinction and qualification, from Illinois 55, from Washington, D.C. 108 and from New York 130. In the judgment of this Senator, every single one of the 1,181 persons I list is better qualified and would serve as a more competent and effective Attorney General than the man we are asked to confirm today.

Mr. President, what were the Founding Fathers thinking of when they gave the U.S. Senate the power to advise and consent to the President's top policymaking positions in our Government? Why did they do it? Why didn't they simply let the President appoint his Cabinet without consent by the Senate? Obviously they expected that Presidents, being human, would not appoint the best qualified persons, the people who could serve our country with the greatest distinction. Instead they feared that the President would tend to appoint his friends, his cronies, his buddies, the people with whom he felt comfortable, the kind of nominee who would protect the President and his administration if the President should get into trouble. The Founding Fathers recognized that almost any President of any party would look for one single qualification above all others. That quality would be loyalty to the President. How prescient they were! At first the nominations to the Cabinet by our Presidents were excellent. Our first Presidents made magnificent appointments. Alexander Hamilton still ranks as probably the country's greatest Secretary of the Treasury. Thomas Jefferson was a superb Secretary of State.

It is doubtful if better qualified candidates would have been found anywhere in those Thirteen Original States. But today in a country with 600,000 lawyers, we have a nominee to be the country's top lawyer who has earned absolutely no distinction at any level or in any way as a lawyer. Mr. Meese would administer over 60,000 employees, thousands of them top professionals. What administrative experience has he had? Virtually none. With his record if any Senator here had a vote in determining who would run a law office in Oshkosh, or Scranton, or Winston-Salem, or Seattle—of course, Seattle, Mr. Meese would not make it on his record. Yes, indeed, he does have the warm friendship of the President. He is a close and trusted friend. But that is it. And this pathetic lack of qualifications is precisely why the Constitution charges us as Senators with the responsibility of advising and consenting to this nomination.

Voting "No" on a Presidential nomination is never easy. It is always easier to go along with the President and with a man who will have the kind of power Mr. Meese will have as Attorney General. The Attorney General can be a very important man in deciding whether or not to give a Senator a hand in the Senator's plea to bring the Justice Department's authority to bear in any number of situations that could and probably will develop on his State. The Attorney General can say "yes" or "no" in deciding whether to prosecute or not prosecute, to negotiate a settlement or to press for conviction. Often these decisions are very close. Frequently they can be absolutely critical to the economy of a State. It is a simple first rule in politics that an elected official does not make enemies unnecessarily. The second rule is that you especially do not make enemies if those enemies have power they can use against you. Let us not kid ourselves. Mr. Meese will be confirmed. We will have very considerable power. So the temptation for Senators to walk out on their responsibility under the Constitution will be very great.

On the other hand, this should be an easy decision. Is Mr. Meese qualified? The answer is: "No Way." The fact that a Senator can provide 1,181 persons identified by name who are in all likelihood better qualified makes that obvious.

THE MEESE-GENERAL DYNAMICS CONNECTION

Mr. President, several weeks ago, I asked Mr. Meese to confirm a meeting he had with David Lewis, chairman of the board of General Dynamics, in August 1981, and to list any other meetings he or his staff may have had with Lewis or other officials of the company. Mr. Meese confirmed the August 1981 meeting and listed a number of other meetings and conversations with General Dynamics. The company contacted him to discuss problems it was having on the Trident program, to express its interest in the Cruise Missile Program, and to discuss the F-16A aircraft program.

The Meese-General Dynamics connection is interesting from two perspectives. It is a rare, although tantalizingly sketchy, look into the White House and how a top Presidential adviser relates to defense contractors and throws his weight around. It cannot now be concluded that Mr. Meese did anything improper concerning General Dynamics. It is true that the meeting about Trident came at a critical time when the firm was embroiled in a bitter controversy with the Navy, and that in the weeks that followed the Navy turned around and made decisions in General Dynamics' favor. But there is nothing on the record that indicates there were improprieties.

On the other hand, Mr. Meese has not been completely candid about this matter and a number of inconsistencies are now on the record. For example, on January 28 he told me that his records revealed no meetings or conversations between himself or his staff and Navy Secretary John Lehman or other Navy officials concerning General Dynamics. But on February 8, Secretary Lehman wrote me that during the period in question, August-December 1981, he did receive a message from Mr. Meese's staff about General Dynamics.

Mr. Meese states that his relationship with General Dynamics was minimal and routine. Yet they involved discussions about three separate weapon systems according to Mr. Meese. Is it minimal and routine for a White House advisor to let his Office become a kind of hand-holding operation for a major defense contractor?

I asked Mr. Meese if he discussed defense contract problems with firms other than General Dynamics and if so to provide a listing of them. His response was that he has met with numerous representatives of firms, large and small and "Our records do not provide a listing as to which, if any, of them might have contracts with the Department of Defense or its subordinate entities." Is Mr. Meese saying that if he had meetings with officials of Lockheed, Boeing, North American Rockwell and McDonald-Douglas that he would not be aware that they had defense contracts?

The lack of candor and the inconsistencies, his inability to recall certain facts, and the evasiveness of his responses are what concern me.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD my correspondence with Ed Meese and the letters I received from Secretary Lehman.

There being no objection , the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, DC, January 18, 1985.

Mr. EDWIN MEESE III,
Counselor to the President,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. MEESE: You may be aware that I have been investigating Navy shipbuilding contracts with the General Dynamics Corporation. According to press accounts, you met with David Lewis, General Dynamics' Chairman of the Board, at the White House on at least one occasion in 1981 to discuss the company's problems with the Navy. I am requesting the following information:

1. A listing of any meetings or telephone conversations since January 1981 between yourself or members of your staff and Mr. Lewis and any other officials or employees of General Dynamics, including lawyers and consultants representing the firm.

2. The dates and purposes of any such meetings or telephone conversations.

3. A listing of any meetings or telephone conversations since January 1981 between yourself or members of your staff and Navy Secretary John Lehman or other Navy officials concerning Navy contracts with General Dynamics.

4. The dates and purposes of any such meetings or telephone conversations.

5. A listing of any meetings or telephone conversations since January 1981 between yourself or members of your staff and Attorney General William French Smith or other Justice Department officials concerning General Dynamics.

6. The dates and purposes of any such meetings or telephone conversations.

Please provide this information no later than January 29, 1985. Your cooperation will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
Vice Chairman, Subcommittee on International Trade, Finance, and Security Economics.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 28, 1985.

Hon. WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR PROXMIRE: In response to your 18 January 1985 letter, I attach information derived from a search of my office records. You will note that neither I nor my staff ever had any contact with the Department of Justice regarding any matter concerning General Dynamics, other than recent routine briefings for my current confirmation hearings.

Indeed, you will see that my staff refused a request by General Dynamics that a call be made to the Department of Justice in support of a report for a favorable press release in January, 1984. This refusal was considered so routine and so in accordance with my standard instructions that the matter was never even raised with me.

Sincerely,

EDWIN MEESE III,
Counsellor to the President.

RESPONSE TO QUESTIONS OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

Questions 1 and 2:

A. Meetings with Edwin Meese:

1. 7 August 1981 meeting for 15 minutes between Edwin Meese, Edwin Thomas (Meese's assistant), David Lewis (chairman of General Dynamics), and Edward LeFevre (a General Dynamics executive). Lewis and LeFevre told Meese that a conflict regarding problems in constructing the trident submarine had arisen between the Secretary of Defense and General Dynamics. Mr. Meese decided the White House would not become involved in the circumstances of the dispute, but that he would call Secretary Weinberger to determine the possibility of arranging a meeting between the parties.

2. 17 March 1983 meeting for 15 minutes between Edwin Meese and Edward LeFevre. LeFevre apprised Meese of General Dynamics' interest in the cruise missile project. Meese received this as information only and took no action.

B. Meetings with Meese's Staff:

1. 14 October 1981 meeting between Robert Garrick, then Meese's Deputy, and Edward LeFevre. The only record of this meeting is a secret service clearance into the White House, but the subject was apparently the same as the 7 August 1981 meeting described above.

2. 22 December 1981 meeting between James E. Jenkins, Deputy Counsellor to the President, and Edward LeFevre that was of a purely social nature (Jenkins and LeFevre have known each other for 30 years).

3. 7 May 1984 meeting between Edward LeFevre and James Jenkins to secure a reference concerning someone LeFevre was considering for employment.

C. Telephone Conversations with Edwin Meese:

Our records revealed no telephone conversations between Edwin Meese and General Dynamics officials (or employees, lawyers, consultants).

D. Telephone Conversations with Meese's Staff:

1. 26 August 1981 telephone conversation between Robert Garrick and Edward LeFevre. The purpose appears to be a follow-up to the 7 August 1981 meeting.

2. There were six telephone conversations between James Jenkins (Mr. Meese's Deputy at the time) and Edward LeFevre:

4 February 1982: concerning a social invitation.

18 April 1983: concerning setting up a meeting between Jenkins and LeFevre.

14 June 1983: asking Jenkins' assistance in having the Vice President accept a speaking invitation.

15 June 1983: same purpose as 14 June 1983 conversation.

15 September 1983: asking Jenkins' assistance in having the President attend launching of the trident submarine "Scoop Jackson".

28 October 1983: seeking guidance on government help in selling F-16A's to our allies. Jenkins referred this to the Foreign Military Sales Office at the State Department.

3. 19 January 1984 call from Ted LeFevre to Dorothy Kuhn, Assistant to James Jenkins. LeFevre had asked the Department of Justice to issue a press release saying that no charges against General Dynamics had resulted from the Department of Justice investigation, but DOJ refused. LeFevre wanted the White House to intervene. Miss Kuhn brought this up with Kenneth Cribb, Meese's Assistant. Cribb refused to place a call to DOJ or to interfere in any way on this matter.

Questions 3 and 4:

Our records revealed no such conversations or meetings.

Questions 5 and 6:

Our records revealed no meetings between Edwin Meese and Justice Department officials concerning General Dynamics. During the recent briefing process for confirmation hearings as Attorney General, the Justice Department advised Mr. Meese of Senator Grassley's interest in obtaining access to files on the ongoing investigation of the General Dynamics Electric Boat Division. Those briefings were as follows: (a) 20 December 1984 briefing by the Deputy Attorney General; (b) 6 January 1985 briefing by the Associate Attorney General; (c) 7 January 1985 briefing by the Acting Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, DC, January 31, 1985.

Hon. JOSEPH BIDEN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR JOE: I would be very grateful if you would send to Edwin Meese, III, a series of questions I have prepared inquiring into his relationship with General Dynamics and other defense contractors, and request that the answers be submitted as soon as possible for the record of your Committee's confirmation hearings. I am hopeful that Mr. Meese's response will be available before the Senate is called upon to vote on his nomination.

By the way, I read the remarks you made in yesterday's hearings, as reported in the Washington Post, and was impressed with the way you got to the heart of the matter.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
Vice Chairman, Subcommittee on International Trade, Finance, and Security Economics.

QUESTIONS FOR MR. MEESE FROM SENATOR WILLIAM PROXMIRE

1. According to your January 28, 1985, letter, your first meeting with General Dynamics occurred on August 7, 1981, and it was with David Lewis, Chairman of the Board, and Edward LeFevre, the company's chief lobbyist in Washington. Describe how this meeting was arranged, who called your office to set it up, and when the call, if there was such a call, was made.

2. Why did you agree to meet with Mr. Lewis?

3. Did you know in advance that he wanted to talk about the company's problems with the Defense Department over construction of the Trident?

4. Did you know that the company was experiencing very large cost overruns on the Trident and that it was facing large losses on this contract?

5. Were you aware that the company was taking steps to avoid having to report those losses to the SEC or disclose them to the public?

6. Were the company's finances or its cost overruns discussed in the August 7, 1981, meeting?

7. Were you aware at the meting that Mr. Lewis and Mr. LeFevre were anxious to get Admiral H. G. Rickover fired or forced to retire?

8. Did the subject of Admiral Rickover come up at this or any other meeting or conversation with General Dynamics?

9. Were you aware at the time of the meeting that the Justice Department was investigating General Dynamics for allegedly filing false claims against the Navy?

10. Did the Justice Department's investigation come up at the meeting?

11. Were you asked to intervene on any of these matters at the August 7 meeting?

12. Whose idea was it for you to call Secretary Weinberger about the Trident program?

13. Why did you agree to arrange a meeting with Secretary Weinberger and General Dynamics concerning the Trident program?

14. Did you call Secretary Weinberger to set up a meeting with General Dynamics? When?

15. Did such a meeting take place? If so, when and who took part?

16. Were you aware that a call by you to the Pentagon could be interpreted as applying White House pressure in favor of General Dynamics, and did you intend to apply pressure?

17. Were you or your staff ever asked by General Dynamics officials to intervene with the Navy on Trident or any other Navy contract?

18. Were you or your staff asked to interverne with the Justice Department prior to the closing down of the General Dynamics investigation in December 1981?

19. Have you or your staff ever discussed the Justice Department's investigation of General Dynamics with Lowell Jensen or any other Justice official?

20. Can you explain why General Dynamics came to you to discuss its defense contracts problems rather then discussing them with the Defense Department?

21. Did you invite General Dynamics to inform you if it had problems with its defense contracts?

22. Did you discuss defense contract problems with firms other than General Dynamics, and, if so, will you provide a listing of any meetings or telephone conversations since January 1981 between yourself or members of your staff and officials or representatives of such firms?

23. Are you aware that, in September and October of 1984, James Baker and Fred Fielding intervened in efforts by Senator Grassley and Senator Proxmire to obtain the records of the Justice Department investigation of General Dynamics?

24. Are you aware that, in September and October 1984, Mr. Baker and Mr. Fielding intervened in the Grassley subcommittee requests for the Justice Department records?

25. Have you talked to Mr. Baker or Mr. Fielding about the General Dynamics case?

26. Did you know about Mr. Baker's and Mr. Fielding's intervention in the congressional dispute over access to the Justice Department's records of the General Dynamics investigation at the time they were intervening?

27. Did you recommend or make your views known to Mr. Baker or Mr. Fielding that the Justice Department records not be turned over to the Grassley subcommittee?

28. In view of the contacts you and your staff have had with General Dynamics since 1981, do you think it would be proper for you to take any part in the present investigation of General Dynamics, if you are confirmed, or do you intend to recuse yourself from the case?

29. Last August, Attorney General Smith took part in a ship-launching ceremony at the invitation of General Dynamics, after he recused himself from the General Dynamics case because of a possible conflict of interest. Do you think it was proper for the Attorney General to take part in such a ceremony of a company under investigation by the Justice Department, and would you take part in such a ceremony for a firm under investigation by the Justice Department if you are confirmed as Attorney General?

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
Washington, DC, February 8, 1985.

Hon. WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR PROXMIRE: Mr. Kaufman of your staff has inquired whether Mr. Edwin Meese had ever discussed the subject of General Dynamics with me during 1981.

I have no recollection of discussing the subject of General Dynamics with Mr. Edwin Meese. Although the specific date is unknown, my best recollection is that a message was conveyed during that period from a member of Mr. Meese's staff to the effect that the Navy should continue to do what it was doing and that Mr. Meese did not wish to become involved in the matter.

Sincerely,

JOHN LEHMAN,
Secretary of the Navy.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 18, 1985.

Hon. WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR PROXMIRE: Before giving a detailed response to your second set of questions, which were provided to me after the close of my confirmation hearings, a brief overall statement is in order.

The involvement of my office in the U.S. Navy-General Dynamics relationship in 1981 was altogether routine and minimal. My practice, like that of other White House staff officials (in this and previous administrations), is to meet with individuals who believe they have significant information, grievances, or views to offer representatives of the President.

In line with this practice, on August 7, 1981, I met with Mr. David Lewis of General Dynamics, who discussed his company's then-pending dispute with the Department of the Navy relating to the manufacture of the Trident submarine. I determined, again as a completely routine matter, that the White House would not become involved in the controversy and that the matter should be left to the primary parties—the Department of Defense and General Dynamics—to resolve, hopefully in a constructive fashion. I do not recall and have no records of any meetings or conversations on this subject with Defense Secretary Weinberger or Navy Secretary Lehman. Neither then nor thereafter did I lend any support whatsoever to General Dynamics' position in the dispute—neither in communications with the Defense Department, the Navy, the President, any of my colleagues in the White House, or anyone else in the Administration. Nor did I at any time become involved in any way with any Department of Justice matters concerning General Dynamics.

My responses to your specific questions are as follows:

Questions 1—5.

The August 7, 1981 meeting was requested by representatives of General Dynamics. I do not know, nor do office records show, who called my office or when such a call was made. I agreed to meet with Mr. Lewis for the reasons stated above, in accordance with White House practice. I do not recall whether I knew in advance that Mr. Lewis wanted to talk specifically about problems relating to the construction of the Trident, but I do recall that Mr. Lewis wanted to discuss problems between the Department of Defense and General Dynamics. I did not know whether General Dynamics was experiencing cost overruns or facing large contract losses, and was unaware of any actions that the company might have been taking with respect to its financial reporting to the SEC or to the public.

Questions 6-11.

To the best of my recollection, there were discussions at the August 7, 1981 meeting about problems between General Dynamics and the Navy on construction of the Trident submarine. I do not recall any discussion of cost overruns and am certain there was no discussion about Admiral Rickover or any Justice Department investigation. I was not aware whether Mr. Lewis and Mr. LeFevre desired Admiral Rickover's firing or forced retirement, or whether the Justice Department was "investigating General Dynamics for allegedly filing false claims against the Navy." I certainly was not "asked to intervene on any of these matters."

Questions 12-16.

General Dynamics requested that I telephone Secretary Weinberger because the company had been unable to secure a meeting with him. To the best of my recollection, which is confirmed by the records of both my office and Secretary Weinberger's office, I did not telephone the Secretary to arrange a meeting. I did not agree to arrange such a meeting, but simply stated that I would look into the possibility. I do not know whether any such meeting ever took place. Furthermore, I did not believe, nor did I intend, that any actions that might be taken by my office, acting in accordance with longstanding White House practices, "would be interpreted as applying pressure." As Secretary Lehman has advised your office, in fact no pressure was exerted.

Questions 17-19.

Neither my staff nor I was ever requested by General Dynamics officials to intervene with the Navy with respect to Trident or any other Navy contract. Nor were we "asked to intervene with the Justice Department prior to the closing down of the General Dynamics investigation in December 1981." The only discussion I have had with any Justice officials concerning General Dynamics was during routine briefings in connection with the current confirmation proceedings.

Question 20-22.

I did not invite General Dynamics to raise any problems with me, and assume that the company did so because it desired an opportunity to be heard. During the past four years my staff and I, along with most members of the White House Office, have met with numerous persons ranging from individual businessmen to representatives of firms, large and small. Our records do not provide a listing as to which, if any, of them might have contracts with the Department of Defense or its subordinate entities. Therefore, I have no way of answering Question 22 unless you refer to a specific company or transaction and in some specific time context.

Question 23-27.

I do not recall, prior to receiving your questions, being aware of any of the matters raised in questions 23, 24 and 26. I do not now know whether such actions took place. Mr. Fielding indicates that he purposefully would have avoided bringing such matters to me because of my status as Attorney General-designate.

I do not recall talking to Mr. Baker or Mr. Fielding about the General Dynamics case. I recall no recommendation or expression of views to Mr. Baker or Mr. Fielding that the Justice Department records not be turned over to the Grassley subcommmittee.

Question 28.

As I stated in the hearings on my confirmation, I would be guided by the legal opinions from the Office of Legal Counsel with respect to the propriety of recusing myself from specific matters before the Justice Department. I therefore have an open mind on the question you raise. I should add, however, that since my contacts with General Dynamics officials have been so minimal and since they did not relate to the Justice Department's investigation, I do not presently see a basis for recusal.

Question 29.

I do not think it would be appropriate for me to express an opinion, directly or indirectly, on the actions of the current Attorney General. The question about my own participation is totally hypothetical. But, as a general rule, I do not intend to take part in ceremonies or other events sponsored by firms that are under investigation by the Department of Justice.

Sincerely,

EDWIN MEESE III,
Counsellor to the President.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Again, Mr. President, when the name of Edwin Meese is presented to the Senate for confirmation as Attorney General of the United States, I shall vote "no."

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, it is my understanding that there are a number of Members who wish to be heard on the Meese nomination. The Senator from Ohio has made it clear he would not delay the vote and I do not intend to do so.

However, I believe that those Senators who wish to be heard should come to the floor. I do not know what the position of the manager of the matter is as the chairman of the committee or when he intends to go forward with the vote, but as I understand it around here when there is no further debate the issue comes up for a vote automatically.

I do not want to preclude anyone who wishes to be heard, but I would urge upon them that they come to the floor rather than expect that the floor will be protected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests that the sentiments of the Senator from Ohio are well taken.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, I shall be brief in these remarks, for everything that could reasonably be said about this nomination and, unfortunately, much more—has already been stated and restated over the course of 1 full year.

Months of unsubstantiated innuendo followed by months of intense scrutiny and investigation have failed to alter the most basic relevant facts. Ed Meese is an honorable and principled man who, at great personal expense, has devoted a lifetime of service to his country. He is eminently qualified to serve as Attorney General, by virtue both of his integrity and of his ability.

Throughout his law enforcement career as both scholar and practitioner, Ed Meese has demonstrated precisely the virtues that we seek in the Nation's chief law officer. Whether in his capacity as professor at some of our most distinguished law schools, as an extraordinarily successful prosecutor, as Director of the Center for Criminal Justice Policy and Management, or as Counselor to the President, he has consistently combined hard work, commonsense, and a commitment to the public good in such a way as to translate sound legal theory into workable policy. His unstinting efforts, for example, to ensure that our system of justice considers the rights of crime's victims as well as the rights of crime's perpetrators have benefited people all across this country.

Committing his energies to the public service, Ed Meese has amassed no great fortune; the rewards of his labors have been shared by the community at large. It is ironic, therefore, that vicious allegations necessitated work even by an independent counsel to compile the full record showing that this nominee has never designed to use public office for private gain.

Our recent hearings in the Judiciary Committee examined in great detail the findings made by independent counsel Jacob Stein and his expert team. Their exhaustive report, compiled over a 6-month period, is an extraordinarily precise document: It has not been shown to contain a single factual error. This accuracy reflects the thoroughness of the investigation conducted by Mr. Stein and his pick of FBI agents and crack prosecutors. They sifted through thousands of papers, including telephone logs, staff notes, and internal White House files: They were refused no document they sought. They interviewed over 200 witnesses, and no one they asked refused to testify. Wherever innuendo had been raised, they found the true facts.

At the conclusion of their investigation, Mr. Stein and his staff proclaimed: "We find no basis with respect to any of the * * * allegations for the bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese." The law does not authorize an independent counsel to offer more general observations dealing with questions of ethics, but just as Mr. Stein's report provides us with ultimate conclusions that Mr. Meese has done nothing illegal, it supplies us also with hard facts demonstrating that Ed Meese has done nothing unethical. Indeed, much heralded testimony from lawyers at the Office of Government Ethics who reviewed these facts confirmed that Mr. Meese has at all times acted in accordance not only with the law, but also with the ethical code of conduct.

As the well respected former Attorney General and Secretary of State Bill Rogers noted in his testimony supporting Ed Meese, Common cause and others originally pushed for the independent counsel system as a way of providing—and I quote—"an important safeguard * * * for ultimately assuring that the public accept a finding that there was no improper conduct." That is exactly what the independent counsel found here. I return to the point made so often throughout our hearings that distorted accounts of Mr. Meese's actions cannot be allowed to replace the independent counsel's findings of actual fact. When we know, for example, that loans to Ed Meese were not related to Federal appointments, we cannot subscribe to more sinister hypotheses. Any standard based on "appearances" must be employed in concert with a reasonable interpretation of all the facts on record. Otherwise, the Wall Street Journal would be correct in saying: "Political enemies can be quashed in three easy steps: Raise accusations, damage reputations, ignore vindications."

Ed Meese and his loving family have undergone an ordeal that I do not believe they deserved. They have endured unprecedented scrutiny and attack remarkably well, emerging not embittered but committed still to the ideal of public service. Ed Meese has served his country with distinction, and I look forward to his playing an historic role as Attorney General over the next 4 years. I will vote proudly for his confirmation.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we are ready to vote. This side is ready to vote. If any Senator wants to speak, we certainly do not wish to deny that opportunity on either side. We want to give a full opportunity for everyone to speak who wants to. On the other hand, there is no need in taking 2 days to do something you can do in 1 day.

There is no need to take 3 days to do something you can do in 2 days. I have repeatedly said I think we waste a lot of time here in the Senate. It is very costly to the taxpayers when we do not expedite the work. This matter is coming to a vote. It is just a question of when. The quicker we vote, I think, and dispose of it, we can get on to the farm bill which deserves attention, we can get on to many other matters which deserve attention, and we can get on to the people's business transacted. I hope if there is any further interest in this nomination on either side that it will be expressed, and that the individuals will come forward.

I want to commend the distinguished Senator from Ohio, Senator METZENBAUM, for calling attention to that because it is important, I think, that we not delay. I have heard no desire on the part of the majority leader nor the minority leader not to go forward with this vote. So I hope those who are listening on their squawk boxes in the Senate offices will come forward, or have their Senators come forward and express themselves if they wish to have a vote.

51-059 O-86-38 (Pt. 2)

I notice the distinguished Senator from North Carolina desires to get the floor. I am glad to yield to him.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the distinguished President pro tempore.

Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HECHT). The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I have been hearing the exhortation on the squawkbox, as it is called. I have been here on the floor for an hour but I have elected to bide my time until those who are opposed to Edwin Meese's nomination have had their say.

Let me say at the outset, Mr. President, that I do not doubt the sincerity of anybody who has spoken. But I think they are sincerely wrong. Frankly, during the past year I have been astonished at the vehemence of the criticism of Edwin Meese. A great deal of it has been contrived—in the media and elsewhere. I think there is a hidden motive certainly as to some. But be that as it may, Mr. President, the Senate has begun debate on the nomination of Edwin Meese to be Attorney General of the United States. And I think it is time that we delay no longer, and instead move expeditiously to confirm him.

Mr. President, lost in the shuffle of the cacophony of criticism of Ed Meese has been the fact that this man has devoted himself to public service for most of his professional life. Since he was graduated from law school in 1958, he has served as a criminal prosecutor, as a legal adviser to the governor of California, who happens now to be President of the United States. He also served as a law professor, and now he serves as Counselor to President Reagan.

In these capacities, and in his other civic activities, Ed Meese has demonstrated, I think, a commitment to the common good and the public interest few of his fellow citizens can match. I know that runs contrary to much of the criticism of Ed Meese, but it happens to be a fact. This man is a good citizen. His record over the last 27 years is not that of a man pursuing private gain or personal interest. Those who are fair enough to examine his career are bound to acknowledge that the past 27 years disclose the record of a man deeply concerned about his country, about its future, deeply concerned about law and order, and deeply concerned about the administration of justice.

Mr. President, America is the land of opportunity. We say that now as a cliche. But it is true because in this land men and women of all levels of talent and all degrees of dedication can achieve substantial material rewards in a lifetime of work. Honest ambition, applied in the American marketplace, can and does produce private prosperity on a scale unparalleled in the history of any other people at any other time. And this is good, and all Americans should be grateful for this fact.

But, Mr. President, no country, however blessed with opportunities for individual prosperity, can long endure without men and women who are willing to sacrifice private goods for the commonweal. I have known and worked with Ed Meese since he came to Washington, and I regard him as precisely such a person. And I challenge anyone willing to look objectively—and the keyword, Mr. President, is "objectively"—at Ed Meese's career in public life and try to demonstrate to the contrary. It cannot be done.

We can engage in all manner of showmanship, but when all of the veneer is stripped aside and we look at the nominee, it is clear that Ed Meese is a good, dedicated, and capable man. I have heard acknowledgement of that in these cloakrooms. It is not unusual in this Chamber for politics to raise its head against a symbol that may be portrayed as unpopular. But back there where Senators talk privately, it is acknowledged that Ed Meese has been, and is, a good and capable public servant.

So I reiterate again despite all the vehemence of the criticism of Ed Meese, the fact remains that an honorable man has been attacked here.

I do not think many people realize—in and out of Government across this country—I doubt that really many know—the sacrifices Ed Meese, his wife, and family have made over the past 27 years. His personal financial balance sheet would have been no doubt extraordinary if he had elected to confine himself to private law practice in California, or if he had decided to begin a Washington law practice in January 1984. I do not think there is any question about it. But he did not do that.

As for the rather picky, tacky criticism of Ed Meese, I pose this question: Who among us in this Senate on either side of the aisle has experienced in the preceding 12 months anything like the microscopic national media scrutiny, so full of abuse and inuendo, that Ed Meese has endured? Indeed, some of his most vocal critics—in and out of Congress, in and out of Government, in and out of politics—would fail the test.

Even that group that has assigned to itself the noble name Common Cause has made getting Ed Meese—and I stress the word "getting"—virtually its sole "cause" of late. Senator EAST aptly described the whole atmosphere surrounding this nomination as "carnivorous and cannibalistic." JOHN EAST was right. I wish he were here today to say again what he has so eloquently said before. Senator EAST is recovering from surgery. I hope he will be here tomorrow or whenever the vote is taken on this nomination.

And, Mr. President, how many of us have been required to pay so high a cost, attendant to service in Washington, DC, as Ed Meese and his family have paid, for example, in 1982, with the tragic loss of a son? A lesser man I think would have quit Government service long ago for the comforts of private life.

So, Mr. President, we know this much. Mr. Meese enjoys the full confidence of millions of Americans who have no voice in the editorial columns, or in the television comments, or in the political speeches on this floor or elsewhere.

He has the confidence of the President of the United States, who, this past November, carried all but one State. He has a career of distinguished public service to his country. I think it is time to cease the acrimony and the political posturing and let there be a vote on this man and see how it comes out. I hope the Senators will remember the creditable things about Ed Meese's career and the sacrifices he has made.

And what about the responsibilities of the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. President? Somehow, discussion of that has been lost in the shuffle, except in the twisted logic that has so often been expressed, but we ought to be talking about what are the responsibilities of the Attorney General. In my judgment, I do not think any responsibility of the Attorney General of the United States is more important than his leadership role in our criminal justice system. On that score, Ed Meese passes the test with flying colors. But this is never mentioned. Let me explain what I mean.

Crime in this country has reached the proportion of a plague, and it is a condition from which the average American has loudly called for relief—first sounding the call in fear and now sounding it in anger because so much needs to be done about it. The growing vigilantism that comes from fear and anger is dangerous and must be stopped, but its cause lies in the danger on the streets and the failure of the courts. The answer to vigilantism must be swift and fair governmentally administered punishment for crime, so that there will be no reason for vigilantism.

The thought has often occurred to me during the debate about the picky and tacky criticism of Ed Meese that this country is approaching a crossroads in that respect. If we do not soon deliver on the promises of safe streets and quick justice, the destabilizing effects of lawlessness may soon cross over into the law-abiding community. I need refer only to the episode in New York City and the sympathy the vigilante, frustrated as he was, received in such large proportion.

Let us be fair about it. You can unroll all the lists you want to on the Senate floor, but I cannot think of any person in America better qualified to reform the criminal justice system than Ed Meese. I reiterate, he spent a lifetime studying and working in the criminal justice system. As a deputy district attorney in Alameda, CA, he gained years of practical experience in the reality of criminal trials—not as we wish they would be, but as they are. He has seen the business end of criminal law and procedure, but in that regard it is interesting and perhaps annoying, simultaneously that there are those who have expressed scorn for Ed Meese because in his prosecuting days he would ride along with the police on their beats. They have come forth with criticism even of that. I recall a particularly distasteful column in the Washington Post a few weeks ago dealing with this topic.

Mr. President, I guess I am saying this: If genuine effective reform is to be accomplished, how much better to have a man at the top who knows and understands the flight of our police, men and women, at the bottom. Perhaps that is why Ed Meese has been one of the earliest and most effective leaders for bail reform. He knows firsthand that the revolving door of justice can be lethal to innocent citizens.

But the ugly reality of street crime has not hardened Ed Meese as it has so many. To the contrary, from his early days as a prosecutor, Ed Meese was not only a tough trial lawyer, but a compassionate and optimistic private citizen. He was an active participant in the Alameda County Delinguency Prevention and Family Assistance Program to help young people break out of the economic situations that too often lead to crime.

I would interpose a question here, Mr. President: How many times have you heard reference to that in terms of Ed Meese's career? And another question: Why should that not have been emphasized all along? No; that has not been a part of the discussion, that has not been a part of the debate.

Ed Meese was an adviser to the Crittenden Center, a halfway house for parolees and drug offenders that provides counseling and rehabilitation. This man who has been so constantly and lengthily excoriated found time to be a volunteer legal officer to the Alameda Youth Opportunity Board, which happens to be an organization that finds jobs for young people.

Why has there been no mention of this? Why is that not pertinent to the debate, to the discussion, to the consideration?

Ed Meese has been an active participant in the prison reform movement. While others were out making their fortunes, Ed Meese was spending his nights and his weekends in volunteer service to his community. And it is from this very solid base of practical law enforcement and community experience that Ed Meese moved up to the higher levels of understanding of criminal justice.

I would wager, Mr. President, that not 5 percent of the American people, based on the news reports, are aware that Ed Meese taught law at one of the Nation's preeminent law schools, the University of California at Berkley, as well as the University of San Diego. If we went out on the streets of Washington or any community in this Nation, how many people would know that he was director of the Center for the Study and Research of Criminal Law at USD.

He was a member of the trial and appeal advocacy advisory board at the Hastings College of Law Center and chairman of the California Bar Association's Committee on Indigent Criminals, and he went on to be vice chairman of the California Organized Crime Control Commission, and as then Gov. Ronald Reagan's legal affairs secretary he was chief liaison between the Governor, Mr. Reagan, and the judicial, correctional, and law enforcement agencies.

So where do these editors come from when they say this man is unqualified? How do you compose a list, flamboyantly released, of people better qualified? I would be perfectly willing to lay Ed Meese's credentials alongside those of almost anyone else available to serve as Attorney General of the United States and let the public decide. But the public is not provided an opportunity to make a judgment based on both sides of the argument. And again I insist that I do not doubt the sincerity of anyone who has criticized Mr. Meese, but I say again I think they are sincerely wrong.

When he came to Washington, he came as counselor to the President, and since that time he has been the lead official at the White House on legal and criminal policy reform. So what do we have in this man? And this may be Ed Meese's problem in part. For one thing, you have a tough law-and-order man. Now, you know, Mr. President, in some circles in this country that is not regarded as a desirable thing for a nominee for Attorney General.

The country needs a tough law-and-order man, but Ed Meese is more than that. I remember, Mr. President, his testimony before the Judiciary Committee when he was asked about the use of polygraph for national security purposes. Now, his answer was anything but ideological; I acknowledge that.

He proceeded to explain to the Judiciary Committee that from his firsthand experience with polygraph he was keenly aware of their limitations. He noted that while they can be helpful, usually for the purpose of clearing a suspect, they are not sufficiently reliable to be a central component of an investigation.

Now, this is the kind of a man he is. Certainly, in my judgment, in terms of my relationship with him since he has been in Washington, and I suppose the bottom line, if I can use that cliche—and I do not particularly like it—is that I for one Senator am confident that Ed Meese's decades of experience in law enforcement will invest his policy decisions as Attorney General with this kind of sensible, realistic analysis. Here is a man who is both a theoretician and a practitioner. But when you get to the final judgment, at least insofar as this Senator is concerned, Ed Meese, despite all of the criticism, contrived and otherwise, is preeminently qualified to be the next Attorney General of the United States. And this Senator believes that he deserves confirmation.

Mr. GLENN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, the Senate has pondered the nomination of Edwin Meese III to be Attorney General for nearly a year. This has not been an easy or pleasant process but it is an important and necessary one. It is important because the Office of Attorney General is a unique and critical Cabinet position. It is necessary because in light of the Senate's duties to advise and consent, we are responsible for ensuring the integrity of Government and maintaining the public's faith and confidence in our political institutions.

In many ways, the Office of Attorney General is the most important appointment a President makes. The Attorney General serves as the chief legal adviser not only to the President but to all Federal agencies. This person is the Nation's chief law enforcement officer and is responsible for protecting the civil rights and liberties of all Americans, regardless of their economic status or philosophical beliefs. This high office requires a person who symbolizes the highest standards of integrity, justice, and impartiality in the fair and evenhanded administration of the law.

I believe our duty as Senators is clear. It is to carefully review Mr. Meese's past actions and statements and measure them against the special responsibilities and high visibility of the Office of Attorney General. We must remember that our action on this nomination will send a message to the American people and to all who cherish the freedom and justice our system of laws provides. To keep their faith, that message must convey our insistence that the Attorney General meet the most rigorous standards of ethical conduct and possess complete dedication to full and fair treatment of all our citizens under the law.

Over the past few weeks it has been suggested—even by some in the Senate—that the standards I have enunciated are too high or, even worse, hypocritical. It has been argued that Senators themselves could not meet those standards—and that it is therefore unfair to ask Mr. Meese to do so.

But that argument is wrong for reasons that go beyond the question of whether Senators could or could not meet the standards. It is wrong because it misses the crucial distinction between those appointed to serve as Attorney General and those elected to serve in Congress. As Senators, we must stand for election and are accountable to the people. If they lose faith in us—or believe our conduct, judgment or ethics to be improper—they may use the ballot to remove us from office. The Attorney General, however, is appointed by the President, not elected by the people. And that is why the Constitution gives us—as the people's representatives—the duty to advise the President on his nominations and to give or withhold our consent on his nominees.

Unfortunately, Mr. Meese's past actions and statements raise serious questions regarding his inclination and ability to administer the duties of Attorney General in a rigorous and even-handed manner. By calling the American Civil Liberties Union "a criminals' lobby," for example, Mr. Meese reveals a callous disregard for the rights of the accused. By praising the Grove City decision of the Supreme Court, Mr. Meese conveys his belief that our civil rights laws may be selectively enforced to permit discrimination.

While Mr. Meese's views on these important legal issues are disheartening, his actions as counselor to the President are deeply disturbing. Mr. Meese was instrumental in the effort to eliminate funding for the Legal Services Corporation, and when Congress rejected that proposal, he used the appointment of people opposed to the Corporation to undermine its effectiveness and thwart the intentions of Congress. Mr. Meese was also involved in packing the U.S. Civil Rights Commission which, for 25 years, had served the Nation and Presidents of both parties with the effectiveness and credibility that only complete independence can engender. His active participation in changing Government regulations to grant Bob Jones University tax-exempt status casts serious doubt on Mr. Meese's willingness to enforce laws intended to eliminate segregation and racism.

Now some have argued that none of this should necessarily disqualify Mr. Meese from serving as Attorney General. In their view, Mr. Meese's past statements and actions are merely reflective of a particular political orientation—and that while others may disagree with that orientation, a President should be able to appoint men and women of his ideological choosing, so long as they possess the judgment and ethical sensibilities required of the office. Mr. President, to some degree I share those sentiments. And so, while I continue to believe that a well developed social conscience is essential for an Attorney General, the crucial question for me is not whether Mr. Meese's politics are right or left—but whether his ethics are right or wrong.

More recently, the Senate Judiciary Committee has once again examined Mr. Meese's behavior while serving as a public official; behavior which reveals extremely poor judgment at best—and an ethical blindspot at worst. Although Mr. Meese has been cleared of indictable offenses, that finding should hardly be interpreted as giving Mr. Meese a clean bill of ethical health. Indeed, in evaluating his qualifications to be Attorney General, I believe we must go beyond the narrow question of whether or not Mr. Meese acted illegally, and confront the broader question of whether or not he acted improperly. And to do that, we must carefully examine the actions by Mr. Meese that inspired the special prosecutor's investigation in the first place.

Executive Order 11222 prohibits Government officers and employees from actions "which might result in, or create the appearance of, using public office for private gain; giving preferential treatment to any organization or person; or losing complete independence or impartiality of action; or affecting adversely the confidence of the public in the integrity of the Government." Federal regulations further state that—

> It is equally important that each employee (of the Executive Office of the President) avoid becoming involved in situations which present the possibility, or even the appearance, that his official position might be used to private advantage. (Emphasis added.)

By accepting unsecured loans from Mr. John McKean totaling $60,000—on which interest was deferred—and then by participating in the selection of Mr. McKean for a Federal position, Mr. Meese showed gross insensitivity to the appearance of impropriety. By failing to realize that his position as counselor to the President might result in preferential treatment of his application to return to the Active Army Reserves and, later, of his promotion to the rank of colonel, Mr. Meese demonstrated extremely poor judgment. And by asking that a check he had already deposited be crudely altered to say "consulting fees" instead of "moving expenses" after he discovered that the latter might be illegal, Mr. Meese exhibited a clear contempt for the intent of the laws he is sworn to uphold.

In light of his many years in politics and public service, I find it utterly incredible that Mr. Meese would seek to defend these actions and profess not to understand why they have, in the words of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, placed "a disagreeable scent in the public nostril." I can only conclude that Mr. Meese either does not understand the special responsibilities and ethical standards required of public officials, or that he holds them in regrettably low regard.

Mr. President, recent history tragically demonstrates the dangers that lie in confirming an Attorney General who displays a cavalier disregard of ethical propriety and a callous indifference toward civil rights and liberties. On this nomination we must demonstrate to the public that we have learned the lessons of Watergate; namely, that partisan loyalty and personal friendship with the President are alone insufficient qualification for the highest legal office in the land. On this nomination, we must affirm that service as Attorney General is and should be a high and noble calling, reserved only for those who meet the highest professional and ethical standards. And we must prove that the check and balance of advice and consent—which protects our laws and rights from politicization—is alive, well, and evident in this Congress and in this confirmation.

Mr. President, this is not a department that just administers a lot of dollars and programs. It is not a dollars-and-cents department. This department administers what we consider the right or wrong for this country, what laws should be emphasized. This is a department that assures that we have equality for all our citizens. This is the department that says there will be fairness to each and every person in our land. It is the department that, in effect, sets the moral tone for the United States of America.

What we need in the Office of Attorney General is not a superman, a Solomon, or a saint. What we need is merely a human being who is keenly aware of the power, scope, and responsibilities of the Office; an individual who clearly understands and fulfills the ethical demands of high public office, and a person who is wiliing to extend to others the same compassion and tolerance of human imperfection that he asks for himself.

In my judgment, Mr. Meese is not that person.

By declaring that "the progressive income tax is immoral" and by implying that those who shiver in the cold of winter soup lines are little more than cheaters and freeloaders, Mr.

Meese has shown himself to be disposed to the strong and disdainful of the weak.

By describing the American Civil Liberties Union as "a criminals' lobby," Mr. Meese has exhibited a shocking scornfulness for the rights of the accused and a probable predisposition to prosecute crime in the streets more vigorously than crime in the suites.

By praising the Supreme Court's Grove City decision, and by actively participating in the scheme to grant tax breaks to segregationist academies, Mr. Meese has revealed a worrisome tepidness toward civil rights, and troubling tolerance of uncivil wrongs.

By accepting several unsecured loans from a man he later helped appoint to a Federal position; by accepting a promotion in the Army Reserves that smacked of preferential treatment; and by asking that a check he had already deposited be altered when it appeared that the original purpose of the check might be illegal—by doing all these things, Mr. Meese has demonstrated that he is lacking in judgment and appallingly indifferent to the appearance of impropriety.

Accordingly, I shall vote against the confirmation of Edwin Meese as Attorney General—and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I commend my colleague from Ohio for the excellent statement he has made in connection with this matter.

Mr. President, a great number of editorials have been written in connection with this matter. I ask unanimous consent that these editorials be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEESE LEGAL EAGLES

Whether Ed Meese has the capacity to become a competent attorney general of the United States is a matter of partisan opinion. One thing for sure, though, he is not turning out to be any bargain for the U.S. taxpayers.

On the eve of his second confirmation hearing this week—the first one was delayed by wrangling over whether charges of financial misconduct against him had any legal basis—Mr. Meese has submitted a request for reimbursement of $720,000 in legal fees incurred during an independent counsel's investigation of the White House aide's finances.

Mr. Meese apparently emerged relatively unscathed from the investigation, although an important question remains: Is he even remotely the best possible candidate for the post of the nation's top judicial officer? He undoubtedly would say yes, although his opponents plan to bring up other charges which they say were not settled by the special counsel's report and which, they say, raise serious questions about his fitness for such a high office.

What is even more irritating is the way Mr. Meese's lawyers have sought top dollar for their services. The tab runs to $225 an hour, which is defended as being the going market rate for attorneys in the nation's capital. That led Jack Germond and Jules Witcover, whose column appears in The Blade's Pages of Opinion, to remark that inasmuch as the Reagan administration has sought to put ceilings on other forms of expenditures, why not cap lawyers' fees, too? It is worth noting, incidentally, that in the past two years the Government spent $50 million on payments to private attorneys, some of whom billed Uncle Sam for as much as $285 an hour.

It will be argued that top-rated lawyers will not work for a set fee. In that case there are plenty of less experienced younger lawyers who will. Of course, they would not have the influence within government circles that Mr. Meese desires and is willing to buy—or allow the taxpayers to pay for.

There probably was no good time for Mr. Meese to submit his bill. He could not do it once he has become attorney general. But on the face of it, $720,000 is a high price to pay to assure that Mr. Reagan will find a high-ranking government job for one of his California cronies.

That brings us back to the basic question: Is Ed Meese the best candidate money can buy for the post of attorney general? The answer to that question should be obvious.

REJECT ED MEESE

Tomorrow, the Senate Judiciary Committee is to take up once again the nomination of Edwin Meese to be Attorney General. The committee owes it to the country to give this man's background dispassionate and uninhibited scrutiny. If it does, it will conclude that to confirm him would be to diminish the office.

It won't be easy. Meese is perhaps the closest political associate of a very popular president, whose party controls the Senate. Questions about his conduct as a White House counselor were referred last year, under the Ethics in Government Act, to an independent counsel (formerly called a special prosecutor), Andrew Stein. He concluded that there was not sufficient evidence to indict Meese. He expressly declined to evaluate the propriety of the man's actions.

Despite the narrow limits of that investigation, Meese and others have characterized it as a certification of fitness. The current political wisdom is that, in the face of this "clean bill of health," even skeptics in the Senate will feel obliged to hold their peace.

If they do, they will be ignoring a pattern of conduct that at least violated a standing Executive Order and a federal regulations setting ethical standards for government officers and employees. And they will be doing so in filling the office—attorney general—that, more than any other, is responsible for upholding and enforcing those standards.

The evidence is in Stein's report as independent counsel. Common Cause, the citizens' lobby, has analyzed that report and laid out the case.

It consists of a series of instances in which Meese accepted unusual and substantial financial favors from people who got presidential appointments. He was in every case a member of the White House committee that passed on patronage appointments.

As cited by Common Cause, Executive Order 11222, in effect since 1965, prohibits any action

". . . which might result in, or create the appearance of . . . using public office for private gain; . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person; . . . losing complete independence or impartiality of action; . . . or . . . affecting adversely the confidence of the public in the integrity of the Government."

After joining the president's staff, Meese accepted unsecured loans totaling $60,000 from John R. McKean before and after McKean was appointed to the U.S. Postal Service Board of Governors. The referral to McKean was made by White House aide Michael Deaver, who also arranged a loan from him and proposed him for the presidential appointment. The loans were repaid only after the transaction was reported in the press.

Stein concluded that the facts would not support a criminal action mainly because there was no concrete evidence that Meese "solicited a loan from Mr. McKean with the express or implied intention of assisting him in obtaining a government position, or that Mr. McKean offered to arrange a loan in the expectation or understanding that Mr. Meese would so assist him."

There was only the coincidence of timing and respective interests served. It was surely enough to create the appearance of using public office for private gain.

The pattern was repeated in 1982 in a highly unorthodox transaction concerning the sale of Meese's California home. Three months later, Thomas J. Barrack, who arranged the deal, was appointed deputy undersecretary of Interior.

Also in connection with his real estate, Meese had loans from the Great American First Savings Bank ultimately totaling $402,000. Payments were repeatedly deferred and terms modified after Meese joined the White House. Four officials of the bank received presidential appointments early in the administration.

Meese's friend Edwin Thomas loaned Mrs. Meese $15,000 in 1981, a few days before Reagan took office. At about the same time, Thomas joined the government and in succeeding months, his wife and son got federal jobs.

In 1981, Meese's status in the Army Reserve was changed from retired to active. In 1983, he was promoted from lieutenant colonel to colonel, to a position created especially for him. The effect was to increase his pension benefits. He was under the command of Gen. William Berkman, who at about the same time Meese was recommending for reappointment as Chief of the Army reserve.

There are other examples in the same vein. Together they constitute a pattern of indifference to the appearance of impropriety, if not of deliberate influence peddling.

How can a man so extraordinarily indifferent to the ethical requirements of public service be trusted, as attorney general, to oversee the ethics of the entire executive branch? Sadly, the question answers itself.

TIME TO SAY 'NO' TO EDWIN MEESE

If the U.S. Senate truly respects the law and expects top law officers to show a similar reverence, it will refuse to confirm presidential counselor Edwin Meese III as the next attorney general.

A confirmation hearing on Mr. Meese's nomination was scheduled for today. A full Senate vote was expected within a week or so.

An independent counsel who investigated Mr. Meese for alleged misconduct concluded in September that available evidence did not justify bringing charges against him.

But that was a far cry from an affirmation of Mr. Meese's ethical fitness. The investigation raised enough questions about Mr. Meese's ethical sensitivity to make his nomination ludicrous.

Added to that, the Office of Government Ethics staff concluded that Mr. Meese violated federal ethics rules, but was overruled by its director.

Among other things, the federal standards forbid an official from taking actions that "might result in, or create the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person."

The ethics office staff report focused on two of Mr. Meese's financial transactions. One involved a loan arranged for Mr. Meese by a San Francisco accountant who later was appointed to the U.S. Postal Board of Governors. In the other, Mr. Meese's California home was sold with the help of a man later hired by the Interior Department.

An ironic side issue is that Mr. Meese now is seeking government reimbursement for the more than $720,000 in legal fees he incurred during last year's investigation. The Justice Department—which Mr. Meese would head if he becomes attorney general—is challenging that plea.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Feb. 3, 1985]

MEESE CONFIRMATION UNJUSTIFIED

If the Senate Judiciary Committee and then the full Senate vote to confirm Edwin Meese as attorney general, they will be sending the country a signal that they do not expect the nation's highest legal officer to abide by very high ethical standards. Although Mr. Meese was revealed to have been involved in numerous ethically questionable transactions, he showed in his appearances before the committee no real understanding of why what he did was wrong.

Yet many senators seemed satisfied when they heard Government Ethics Office Director David Martin—in what looked like an extraordinary stretching of the rules—pronounce Mr. Meese ethically clean. Although Mr. Martin acknowledged that Mr. Meese had a problem in relation to ethics rules that forbid even the "appearance" of conflicts of interest, he said he was "totally satisfied" that Mr. Meese was in compliance with the rules. The ethics chief's clearance of Mr. Meese came after he had ignored the earlier conclusions of two staff lawyers that Mr. Meese in two instances "had violated the standards of conduct or other applicable statutes." But the staff lawyers, by the time they appeared before the committee, were, for reasons that are unconvincing, concurring with Mr. Martin.

As shown by the committee testimony of Archibald Cox, former U.S. solicitor general and now chairman of Common Cause, the citizens lobby, the staff lawyers were clearly right in their initial judgement. Mr. Cox, citing Executive Order 11222, said Mr. Meese violated the rules when he helped get high government appointments for California accountant John McKean, who arranged loans for Mr. Meese, and for real estate developer Thomas Barrack, who helped Mr. Meese sell his California house. The order (1) forbids conduct ". . . which might result in, or create the appearance of . . . using public office for private gain (or) losing complete independence or impartiality of action . . ." and requires a public official to step aside if the business or appointment of a benefactor comes before him.

Although Mr. Meese ignored both of these requirements, he was held in compliance with the rules on the thin grounds that Mr. McKean did not personally provide Mr. Meese a loan and that Mr. Meese did not know that Mr. Barrack had put $83,000 of his own money into the Meese house. The facts are that Mr. McKean arranged loans when Mr. Meese needed such help and that Mr. Barrack, with Mr. Meese's knowledge, helped substantially in the sale of the Meese house. Mr. Cox pointed out that government employees are constantly being reprimanded or otherwise disciplined for just such conduct as Mr. Meese's.

Mr. Meese not only violated rules in the McKean and Barrack cases but also in failing to report an interest-free loan to his wife and in urging the reappointment of a general who aided his promotion in the Army Reserve. Given these facts, senators would be blind to ethical standards if they voted to confirm Mr. Meese simply because the president wants him and because Independent Counsel Jacob Stein concluded that Mr. Meese did not commit crimes.

[From the Arizona Daily Star (Tucson), Feb. 3, 1985]

MEESE'S HEARING—DESPITE HIS EXPLANATIONS, A DISTASTEFUL AIR LINGERS

The painstaking and often boring Senate hearing on Edwin Meese's nomination as attorney general is over. All the loose ends seem tied, and the questions answered. He appears free of criminal guilt and violations of ethics. Yet a taint of distaste hangs over Meese that the hearing failed to flush.

Loans for thousands of dollars from a man he later rewarded with a high government post, his promotion in the Army Reserve when Army officials said it gave the appearance of favoritism—these are the matters that still stick in the memory after of all Meese's elaborate explanation. What's left is a man without any felonious guilt, a man who passes the Office of Government Ethics review, a man with lots of friends in high places, but a man who has exercised very poor judgment in several rather important matters.

Between occasional bursts of support by his friend Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, who droned on and on about this "man of character and professional competence," the nation heard Meese explain why he failed to make his mortgage payments for four consecutive months. This man of "professional competence" explained that he received hundreds of letters a day and just doesn't remember the ones from the bank threatening foreclosure.

Try missing four mortgage payments and see what happens. Try persuading the bank that you just didn't see those warning letters and hope they believe you. Meese must have believed it would come out all right, as in fact it did when somebody made him a loan, and that he didn't have to attend to little matters.

But no fairy godmother will appear in the escrow office to produce the money for the rest of us working stiffs. And most of us would take four delinquent mortgage payments pretty seriously.

It's the little things like these and the big ones like patronage and promotions that leave a sour air around Edwin Meese. He's not the man for the job.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Jan. 30, 1985]

HOW MEESE FAILS THE TEST

The Senate Judiciary Committee is deciding whether to endorse Edwin Meese III as attorney general. It should view him with disfavor. His ethical lapses have been grave; his inability to recognize those lapses has been obvious; his lack of demonstrable legal and social sensitivities is undeniable. He has not established, by word or deed, his ability to manage the nation's law.

It is not just a question of specificity. The detailed charges against Messe's ethical awareness are irrefutable. Thus the debate must concern itself with arguments of abstractions. What does the post of attorney general represent? And from that perspective, can Meese adequately fill the role?

The attorney generalship is a position of towering national influence. In this post-Watergate age it has assumed, in addition to its other crucial chores, responsibility as an additional check on the presidency. The position never was one that could be properly served by a person who reflected merely political correctness. Now it is less so.

Yet Meese's great promise to the administration is his politics. At least, the promise surely cannot be his legal skill. As a Reagan aide in California, Meese was responsible for the People's Park debacle at Berkeley, which resulted in the death of activist James Rector. Recalling that event in 1980, Meese is reported to have said: "James Rector deserved to die." Would that peculiar mind-set be applied to questions of vigilantism in the 1980's?

As a presidential counselor, Meese also was responsible for the ill-designed position, adopted by the president on Meese's advice, to support tax exemptions to segregated schools. Given that enforcement of the Civil Rights Act is one of the Justice Department's most persistent battles, does Meese reflect a position appropriate to that cause?

The attorney general also servies as an example. It is not naive to expect, therefore, that the position be filled by someone who can fulfill that charge. Meese fails that test, and fails it badly. He has been involved in indisputably unethical associations as a White House aide, yet he has failed to recognize them. Just as damning is his—and the president's—evident disdain for the reasonable proposal that the appearance of impropriety is as damaging as the impropriety itself.

President Reagan has nominated Edwin Meese because he is a friend and because he is politically reliable. That makes the nomination noble in its loyalty, but it also makes the nomination troubling in its denial of responsiblity. The right of presidents to make nominations depends on their willingness to make fair and objective choices.

There is no evidence that Meese will bring vigor and confidence to Justice. Indeed, the evidence is exactly opposite. Meese represents positions and entertains perspective antithetical to the job. Clealry, he is the wrong man for it.

[From the Detroit Free Press, Jan. 29, 1985]

MEESE: HE MAY GET THE TOP JOB AT JUSTICE, BUT WHAT WILL THE NATION GET?

Edwin Meese is a long, long way from being the best possible nominee to head the Justice Department. It's customary to give the president the benefit of the doubt on cabinet appointments, and it appears that Mr. Meese's nomination as attorney general will glide through the Senate hearings that begin today. If that happens, though, a disservice will have been done.

The confirmation of Mr. Meese has been delayed almost a year because questions were raised about his failure to disclose a $15,000 interest-free loan, the appointment to federal jobs of several individuals who aided him financially, the special treatment for businesses in which he had a financial interest and similar matters. A special counsel examined the case and concluded that there was no basis for indicting Mr. Meese.

President Reagan hailed the counsel's report as vindication of his nominee. But saying Mr. Meese committed no criminal offense is not the same as saying he has displayed the ethical sense expected in the nation's chief law enforcement officer. The facts are that Mr. Meese got substantial financial benefits in loans, gifts and delayed interest payments; that people who gave him those benefits got federal jobs, and that Mr. Meese appears to lack any notion that what he did was wrong.

There's a lot in Mr. Meese's record to suggest that, like William French Smith before him, he has less concern with civil liberties, civil rights and equal protection of the laws than is appropriate in an attorney general. He has termed preventive detention justified and has called the American Civil Liberties Union part of a nationwide criminals' lobby. He's indicated a distaste for enforcing civil rights laws and skepticism that poor people need lawyers.

Yet it is all but assured that the Senate will confirm him. Although integrity is not a quality acquired during a few days of hearings, the senators should make it as clear as possible that, as attorney general, Mr. Meese is expected to hew to higher standards. The cause of justice deserves no less.

[From the Pittsfield (MA) Berkshire Eagle, Jan. 29, 1985]

THE MEESE WHITEWASH

President Reagan has nominated for attorney general his White House counsel, Edwin Meese, who has a bad habit of getting financial favors from people who end up with cushy government jobs. The coincidences were striking enough to prompt the appointment last year of an independent counsel, who came to the conclusion that there wasn't enough hard evidence to justify a criminal indictment.

That's reassuring, but it doesn't answer the question at hand: whether Mr. Meese has the ethical sensitivity that the Senate should expect of a person asking to be confirmed as head of the Department of Justice. Therefore it is gratifying to know that Mr. Meese's ethics—and not just his criminal liability—has been addressed by the Office of Government Ethics.

The staff of that agency studied the report of the independent counsel and came to the conclusion that, in two matters, Mr. Meese's financial dealings had, in fact, appeared to conflict with his official duties. This is a violation of federal regulations which forbid actions by officials that might even "create the appearance of" preferential treatment for someone.

This clear statement of some of the issues involved in the Meese appointment was almost not available to the Senate Judiciary Committee as it begins what its Republican chairman, Strom Thurmond, has said will be just a one-day, hurry-up confirmation hearing of Mr. Meese.

The contents of the report were kept under wraps by the Office of Government Ethics' director, David H. Martin, after he was persuaded by Mr. Meese's attorneys and White House officials not to take action on the staff's findings. The report saw the light of day only after it was leaked to The Wall Street Journal.

There are no damning new revelations in the document. All that the staff's attorneys did was to study the independent counsel's record, examine the pertinent federal regulations and come to a conclusion that should have been obvious to the Senate: Mr. Meese has not met the minimum standard for conduct by government officials or employees. The advantage of having this report on the table is that it forces Senators to recognize just what they will be condoning if they give their blessings to this unworthy nomination.

[From the Staten Island Advance, Jan. 22, 1985]

EDWIN MEESE, AGAIN

Now that the election is over and President Reagan's second term has begun, the Senate will resume an important piece of unfinished business: the confirmation of Edwin Meese as attorney general.

One year ago, when Mr. Meese was nominated for the post, it seemed he would face a long, tough battle for confirmation. Charges of financial misconduct and conflict of interest simply would not go away.

Ultimately, the charges proved so serious that an "independent counsel" (formerly called a "special prosecutor") was appointed to look into them. After a five-month investigation, the counsel released a 400-page report concluding that there was no basis for bringing criminal charges against Mr. Meese.

The report did not, however, pass judgment one way or the other on Mr. Meese's suitability for attorney general. In fact, the independent counsel took great pains, despite pressure from both supporters and opponents of the nomination, to refuse any comment on the subject.

President Reagan, of course, would like us to believe that the counsel's report represents a ringing endorsement of Mr. Meese's qualifications for office. It does no such thing. It merely states that Mr. Meese meets the lowest possible standard by which he could be judged—he is not a criminal.

But does he also meet the highest possible standard by which a potential attorney general should be judged?

On this point the counsel's report is mute; it does not offer a judgment. It does, however, present sufficient evidence, some of it new, to suggest that Mr. Meese acted unethically, if not criminally, on at least three separate occasions:

Mr. Meese apparently played a part in getting a position on the Postal Board of Governors for a San Francisco accountant who arranged personal loans totaling $60,000 and helped postpone for up to 14 months interest payments on those loans. Although there may not have been a quid pro quo involved, on at least one occasion Mr. Meese and the accountant discussed both the job and the loan at the same meeting.

Mr. Meese apparently played a part in getting two high-level government jobs in the Interior Department and the Commerce Department for a Los Angeles lawyer who arranged and financed the sale of Mr. Meese's house.

Mr. Meese allowed the Army to give him preferential treatment by waiving an educational requirement that stood in the way of his promotion within the Army Reserve, despite a warning from the Secretary of the Army to Mr. Meese that such an action would be "unwise." That promotion resulted in Mr. Meese's being eligible for as much as 26 percent more in retirement benefits.

It is, of course, a good thing that the prospective attorney general is not a crook. Such a thing is to be desired of a man who would occupy our nation's top law enforcement position.

But it is also to be desired that that man have an ethical standard that clearly separates right and wrong. That is the job of an attorney general. On that point, unfortunately, Mr. Meese fails. Although his actions were not criminal, they were almost certainly in violation of the federal government's code of ethical standards adopted in 1965.

Taken in conjunction with his apparent disregard for civil liberties—he has publicly called for the abolition of the so-called exclusionary rule, not just for "good faith" cases, but for all cases—the report of the independent counsel should be evidence enough that Edwin Meese is not suited to be attorney general of the United States.

The Senate should reject Mr. Meese's nomination and allow President Reagan to present a more suitable candidate for the job.

[From the Pasco (WA) Tri-City Herald, Jan. 22, 1985]

QUESTION OF ETHICS

A disturbing although not a criminal, picture is painted by "independent counsel" Jacob Stein of Edwin Meese III, nominated by President Reagan to be U.S. Attorney-General.

Mr. Stein, a prominent Washington, D.C. lawyer, investigated 11 allegations of wrongdoing by Mr. Meese. The allegations grew out of Senate committee hearings last March on Mr. Meese's nomination.

In September, Mr. Stein issued a nearly 400-page report concluding that there was "no basis" for bringing criminal charges against Mr. Reagan's long-time friend, counselor and confidant.

Mr. Meese's supporters were jubilant, claiming he had to been vindicated.

But while the report did not recommend the filing of criminal charges, it called into serious question Mr. Meese's ethical qualifications to be the nation's chief law-enforcement officer.

If found, for example, as Common Cause put it, that he has been "grossly insensitive to appearances—approving presidential appointments of men who have done him financial favors, and brushing off signals that his pending promotion (from lieutenant-colonel to colonel in the Army Reserve) appeared to be a result of preferential treatment."

The report also shows "that he is seemingly unaware of some of the laws and regulations governing his conduct as a high-ranking federal official, or careless in observing them."

The picture Mr. Stein's report paints is of a man who repeatedly has violated or ignored ethical standards and regulations and who has, through carelessness or forgetfulness, repeatedly failed to report loans on forms he was required by law to complete.

This record hardly qualifies him to be U.S. Attorney-General.

The Senate should reject Mr. Meese's nomination.

[From the Flint (MI) Journal, Jan. 29, 1985]

UNETHICAL MEESE STILL A BAD CHOICE

Edwin Meese's confirmation as U.S. attorney general has been expected to whiz through the Republican-controlled Senate after minimal exposure before the Senate Judiciary Committee. The timetable may change because of new information revealed Monday.

Meese, a close friend of President Reagan, has shown defiance of ethical standards expected of the nation's most powerful law-enforcement officer. He is, bluntly, a bad example.

A special independent counsel concluded after a long investigation there was no basis to prosecute Meese for accepting loans from people later appointed to government jobs.

But staff reports leaked from the Office of Government Ethics leave no doubt some of his financial transactions appeared to conflict with his official duties as presidential counselor. The reports were quashed in bargaining between that office and Meese's lawyers.

There are serious doubts about Meese's impartiality in other areas. As a deputy district attorney in California in 1964, he supervised the arrest of more than 700 participants in the free-speech movement at Berkeley and put down other civil protests.

He has attacked the American Civil Liberties Union as a "criminals' lobby," objected to exclusion of illegal evidence from trials, and defended Reagan's pardon of FBI officers convicted of unauthorized burglary.

This is the man the nation wants leading its law enforcement? "Law and order" is more than a political catchphrase. It is the sincere desire of most Americans. Yet it must be applied with fairness and high ethics.

We don't see these in this most unfortunate nomination. The Senate should turn him down.

[From the Albuquerque (NM) Journal, Jan. 12, 1985]

MEESE IS STILL A LOSER

A sanitized Edwin Meese III has been renominated by President Reagan as attorney general. Unfortunately, in this second try Meese's chances for Senate confirmation are considered much stronger. Why? Because, despite highly questionable ethics, Meese has been cleared by a special counsel of any criminal wrongdoing.

The sleaze factor lives in Washington, D.C.

Meese's first go-around for Senate confirmation to replace the resigning William French Smith stalled last year, when questions involving Meese's personal finances led to a special prosecutor's investigation. Included in the investigation was the awarding of federal jobs to people who directly or indirectly helped the Meese family financially. And there was the small matter of a no-interest loan to Meese's wife, which Meese failed to disclose.

Clearly, though the special counsel has cleared Meese of any criminal wrongdoing, Meese is not qualified to head the nation's chief law firm. This is because, despite his official innocence, Meese still carries a large ethical scar. It remains that he cashed in on his high office as White House counselor to throw some jobs in the direction of his friends. That is conduct hardly becoming the nation's chief lawyer.

The general practice in Washington is to allow a president his team, to carry out mandate and to support his philosophies. Thus, the Senate usually confirms the president's cabinet appointees.

But on occasion, a candidate emerges who, for various reasons, ranging from questionable past conduct to conflict of interest, ought not to be confirmed. Meese is one such candidate.

But his removal from the criminal list apparently puts him back on the qualified attorney general candidates' list in the minds of many senators. Which tells us one of two things: Either some senators have little understanding of ethical considerations or appearances or they have worried of the Meese issue and simply want to get on with other business.

In either case, confirmation of Meese as attorney general would leave this national lacking in that office. The president could, and should, do better. But since he doesn't seem so inclined, the Senate should force him to find another attorney general designate.

[From the Paladium-Item, Richmond (IN), Jan. 31, 1985]

MEESE NEEDS TO PROVE WORTH

Ed Meese is the Bob Uecker of the White House when it come to ethics.

Bingo.

Meese isn't in the front row. His attitude is way out in left field when it comes to his financial transactions and his friends' securing government jobs.

This week's Senate hearings on Meese's confirmation are like the beer commercials:

"He's qualified!"

"He's not ethical!"

Batted about by both sides is a special counsel's report that cleared Meese of 11 criminal allegations—a hodgepodge of loans, circumstantial evidence, innuendo, real estate and government jobs for his friends.

It took six months and 200 witnesses for the counsel to sort the Meese mess. Meese spent $700,000 on lawyer's fees defending himself.

The counsel refused, however, a request from Congress to rule on Meese's suitability to serve as attorney general, or whether Meese's actions were ethical.

The counsel's reluctance stiffened the backs of Meese's opponents, who equate allegation with fact and find Meese's ethics lacking because of the "facts of the case." They say the best thing that can be said about Meese is that he isn't a criminal.

President Reagan insists that the counsel's finding vindicates Meese. Supporters have cried loudly for Meese's rapid confirmation as attorney general. Accusations and allegations do not tarnish a reputation, say Meese's supporters, who believe he is being chased by the hound-dog media and baying senators.

Unless new information can be found, the Senate will have little option but to confirm Meese's nomination. Before Meese receives its blessing, however, the Senate should make a deliberate inquiry into his ethics, beliefs and financial entanglements.

Meese may not be a criminal but his actions created an appearance of preferential treatment and sleazy deals. His explanations of those actions show a naive understanding of governmental ethics for high officials.

Even though Meese's worst offense may be his naivety, he is obligated to prove that he is suitable and ethical, a man worthy to be in charge of fighting crime in the United States. Without adequate proof, the Senate should refuse to confirm Meese as attorney general.

[From the Bend (OR), Bulletin Jan. 24, 1985]

LET MEESE RETIRE, TOO

Now that his new term officially is under way President Reagan is getting used to operating with several new Cabinet officers. And some of the White House staff has decided that four years is long enough, and will return to more lucrative pursuits.

But one of the faithful still will be around. The president is expected to send the nomination of Edwin Meese III to the Senate to ask once again for his approval as attorney general.

Many presidents have managed to fill that particular office with nonentities. Bobby Kennedy's preparation for it was so limited that his brother was forced to joke about it when he sent the nomination to the Senate. No one would claim that John Mitchell was a great attorney general.

But at least those two and a host of others whose qualifications appeared to have been limited had not had their personal integrity questioned at the time they were nominated. Meese has. There was nothing serious enough in his conduct to bring criminal charges, a special prosecutor found. But he also found that, in his opinion, Meese's ethical standards and public policy judgment left something to be desired.

The president can get Meese confirmed if he wants. No one doubts that. But we wish someone could persuade him to submit another name to replace William French Smith so the attorney general can return to his Los Angeles law firm. And we wish President Reagan would suggest to Ed Meese that it's time for him, too, to retire from federal service.

[From the Watertown Daily Times, Jan. 30, 1985]

ETHICS AND MR. MEESE

Only a few days ago, presidential counselor Edwin Meese seemed well on his way to speedy confirmation by the Senate to head the Justice Department. The revelation that David H. Martin, director of the Office Government Ethics scrapped a staff report which concluded that Mr. Meese violated federal ethical standards has radically altered the situation, however.

An independent counsel last fall found no basis for bringing criminal charges against Mr. Meese for transactions that included a $40,000 loan from San Francisco accountant John R. McKean, and assistance from Thomas Barrack in the sale of the Meese family's California home. Subsequent to the transactions, Mr. McKean was appointed to the U.S. Postal Board of Governors and Mr. Barrack to a post in the Interior Department.

Groups opposed to placing Mr. Meese at the helm of the Justice Department have argued vociferously that clearing him of criminal responsibility was not enough. Just this week, it became apparent that the attorneys who drew up a report for the Office of Government Ethics also shared that opinion. Director Martin, nevertheless, after meeting with Mr. Meese's attorneys and White House counsel Fred F. Fielding, rejected the findings of his staff. Further, neither he nor anyone else with inside knowledge mentioned the unfavorable staff report to Senate Judiciary Committee members, and it did not become public knowledge until the Wall Street Journal disclosed the matter Monday.

Granted, the federal ethics regulations set high standards. They not only forbid government employees to take actions that "might result in, or create the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment" but also urge officials to refrain from actions that could even give the impression that they have lost "complete independence or impartiality of action."

While the argument that Caesar's wife must be above suspicion is an old one, it remains valid in many instances, and particularly where the Justice Department is concerned.

The conclusion is inescapable that Mr. Meese does not measure up to the high ethical standards which the American people have a right to expect of their Attorney General. Given the facts it now has in hand, the Senate therefore should not confirm him for the Justice Department post.

[From the Syracuse Herald-Journal, Feb. 5, 1985]

MEESE: A DISGRACEFUL CHOICE BY ANY STANDARD

Ronald Reagan has made some terrible appointments over the years. James Watt and Anne Gorsuch Burford quickly come to mind.

But the president's nomination of Edwin Meese III for attorney general may be his worst. Yet, after a year's delay. Meese is working his way through the Senate process toward what now appears likely confirmation. Some senators will vote "no"; more will swallow hard, hold their noses and vote "yes" because there has been no public outcry over the nomination.

Common Cause chairman Archibald Cox, Sen. Joseph Biden and a legion of newspaper editorial writers cringe at the thought of Meese as the nation's top law enforcement officer. Beyond that, though, a coast-to-coast collective yawn is almost audible.

Part of the disinterest stems from a widespread belief the president should get his way on appointments. No he shouldn't—not when the choice is as direct a slap at the public good as this one is.

Senate Judiciary Committee hearings reaffirmed that Meese floated around in ethical weightlessness when he first came to Washington.

Big loans, sometimes unsecured and interest-free, to Meese and his wife were followed by political appointments to the loaners. Just coincidences, the public is told.

Meese got far behind on his mortgage payments and another large loan due American First Savings Bank of San Diego. There was no foreclosure. Later, several bank officers were named to government positions. That isn't a conflict of interest, the public is told.

On and on they go—so many allegations that a special federal prosecutor was named to investigate. Last year, the prosecutor decided there was "no basis" under federal law for prosecuting Meese.

The attorney general-designate's supporters point to special prosecutor Jacob Steins findings as exoneration. Legally, yes; ethically, no—a distinction Stein's Sept. 20 report made, Stein explicitly refused to say ". . . that the evidence does not substantiate the loose charges of moral turpitude against Mr. Meese."

Not being indictable is a pretty flimsy base on which to build a case for Meese—especially for a position that requires the highest personal conduct.

"Much more than the career of a single individual will be at stake" when the Senate considers Meese's nomination, says Archibald Cox, the first Watergate prosecutor and now chairman of Common Cause.

"If Meese is confirmed, we will be taught a dismaying lesson about the state of our public ethics, and about the moral code of the United States Senate . . .

"A vote to confirm Meese on the strength of the Stein report would say to thousands of government officials and employees; We, the United States senators, think that anyone in public office should feel free to accept large financial favors that might not otherwise come to him. Don't worry that those who do you a favor may later look for government appointments or have business with the government that you may affect. Don't even worry about later participating in their appointment, or their receipt of other government benefits. We, as senators, see nothing wrong in this. Just be sure not to commit a crime."

Senators should think of that when they reach for their noses. The odor will be partly self-generated.

[From the Burlington, (VT) Vanguard Press, Jan. 27, 1985]

THE CASE AGAINST MEESE

Appointing Ed Meese as the nation's highest law enforcement official is a little like naming a suspected bank robber head of security at Chase Manhattan. Since coming to Washington as the president's counsel, Meese has frequently trod the fine line between perceptions of impropriety and outright malfeasance.

Briefly reviewed, the case against Ed Meese is as follows: He failed repeatedly to report information on his financial disclosure forms required by law. (The Justice Department, which Meese would head, successfully prosecuted Representative George Hansen, R-Idaho, for similar infractions.) In a disturbing pattern of coincidences, four people who loaned Meese or his family money subsequently got top federal jobs. And Meese benefited from an unusual promotion through the Army Reserve ranks—a promotion he was not qualified for, and for which no job existed until the day after Meese was switched from active to the ready reserves.

When questioned about these irregularities last summer, during the first phase of his aborted confirmation hearings, Meese claimed memory loss 79 times—a bout of amnesia the likes of which hasn't hit a public official since Watergate.

A special prosecutor looked into these irregularities, and at charges that Meese was less than candid with a House committee about what he knew of the Debategate affair. The prosecutor, Jacob Stein, found that there was "no basis" to bring criminal charges against the man who would be attorney general. But Stein resisted attempts by Meese's lawyers to issue a statement asserting that Meese was fit to be attorney general. A look at Stein's report shows why the lawyer refused to pass judgment.

Stein was not asked to rule if Meese's conduct was proper for a government official. But those of us who are not bound by such constraints can take the evidence in the report and conclude that Meese is a man who scoffs at even maintaining the appearance of ethical conduct.

The people who loaned him money got federal jobs; and one of the loans was never reported on his financial disclosure forms, an omission that raised the suggestion of bribery. The army officer who engineered Meese's reserve promotion was singled out for praise by Meese when the officer was up for reappointment as reserve chief. Meese called Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger and lobbied on the officer's behalf.

The evidence shows that Meese is either ignorant of the laws governing official conduct, or flouts them outright. But just as disturbing are the programs Meese has supported in office.

Meese has been a guardian angel for Louis Giuffrida, the controversial director of the Federal Emergency Management Administration (FEMA). Meese supports Giuffrida's efforts to redefine "national emergencies"—to include not only run-of-the-mill nuclear wars but also "routine domestic emergencies." National emergencies, according to FEMA's draft legislation, can be met by calling out the military. That definition even upset current Attorney General William French Smith, who accused Giuffrida of trying to set himself up as "emergency czar."

It's likely that Meese will be swiftly approved by a Senate cowed by Reagan's landslide. Meese's confirmation will go through, according to one Senate aide, "like shit through a goose."

But the Senate should still vote its conscience and strongly oppose the Meese nomination, both by vigorously questioning the potential attorney general during the January 29 confirmation hearings and by refusing to give their approval to this dismal choice. We applaud Senator Patrick Leahy, who says he's still opposed to the choice of Ed Meese. We hope that the rest of the Senate, including Robert Stafford, demonstrates a similar concern for the law.

[From the Charleston, (WV) Gazette, January 16, 1985]

BYRD ON MEESE?

Senate Minority Leader Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., has proven himself on occasion to be a keen interrogator of appointees up for Senate confirmation.

We urge Byrd to zero in on Edwin Meese when Byrd and other members of the Judiciary Committee resume hearings Jan. 29 on the attorney general nominee.

Disturbing questions about Meese haven't been dispelled. A thorough hearing, we think, would establish conclusively that he's unfit for the nation's highest law-enforcement post. He reeks of conflicts. For example:

Thomas Barrack put up $83,000 to facilitate sale of Meese's California home. Then Meese joined three fellow White House aides in recommending Barrack for assistant secretary of commerce. Meese didn't tell the other three of his private aid from Barrack.

Meese accepted a $40,000 loan from John McKean, then another loan from McKean, then a $12,000 deferment of interest—all the while supporting McKean's appointment to the U.S. Postal Board of Governors.

Meese failed to report an unsecured, interest-free $15,000 loan which Edwin Thomas gave to Meese's wife just before Thomas was hired as Meese's White House assistant.

Meese joined in decisions to give federal posts to officers of Great American First Savings Bank, while Meese was in default on loans from that bank.

Meese testified that he paid all his moving expenses to Washington at the start of the Reagan administration, but the Presidential Transitional Trust had given him a $10,000 check marked "moving expenses." The words were marked out and "consulting fees" inked in.

Meese urged reappointment of Gen. William Berkman as chief of the Army Reserve after Berkman helped contrive Meese's promotion to Reserve full colonel.

Too many cronies who helped Meese personally got federal plums at Meese's urging. These events have been ruled insufficient for indictment, but they show his unsuitability for a post requiring supreme integrity.

The White House expects Meese's nomination to clear the Senate, but the vote will be close. Keen questioning of the sort Byrd has done in the past might be enough to prevent America from having another dishonest attorney general.

[From the Bridgeton, (NJ) News, Jan. 18, 1985]

NOT ABOVE SUSPICION

Later this month the Senate will resume hearings on the nomination of Edwin Meese III, President Reagan's choice to be attorney general of the United States.

Argument is made that a president should have a right to name his own choice for high appointive office. Such argument is specious. That is why the Constitution provides that such appointments be subject to approval by the Senate.

While the president should have that right, within reason, the public is entitled to have as its chief legal officer a man who is above suspicion—Meese, whatever his other qualifications, is not.

Ohio Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, Meese's principal critic, is expected to question him again on some of his activities, such as his favored promotion in the Army Reserve, the appointment of several of his associates who aided him financially to government jobs, and the 52 times during a previous hearing that he could not remember the situations about which he was being questioned.

A subsequent investigation of Meese's activities found that, whatever irregularities there might be, he had committed no crimes. The report said nothing, however, about ethical or moral implications. It left unanswered about as many questions as it settled. The mere clearing him of any criminal charges does not clear him of suspicion.

Deviousness is not a characteristic we can afford in the nation's highest legal officer. His appointment should be denied.

R.E.B.

[From the Owensboro (KY) Messenger & Inquirer, Jan. 23, 1985]

ETHICS HAVE TAKEN BEATING FROM MEESE

Edwin Meese III should not be confirmed as attorney general.

Meese has violated no laws. But he repeatedly has violated federal ethics regulations. His record speaks for itself.

Meese got a $40,000 unsecured loan (with no interest due for one year) from his accountant John McKean. As a member of the Senior Staff Personnel Committee, Meese supported McKean's nomination to the Postal Board of Governors.

After Meese got another $20,000 loan and deferral of $12,000 in interest payments, much of it overdue, Meese supported McKean for a position on the board with a longer term. McKean had told Meese he wanted that post.

Meese not only failed to remove himself from the discussion of McKean's appointments, but never even mentioned his indebtedness to McKean.

Meese participated in decisions to name officials of Great American First Savings Bank to posts on the President's Commission on Housing, the Legal Services Corporation, the Commission on Civil Rights and the United Nations. At the time Meese supported these appointments, he was several hundred thousand dollars in debt to Great American, had received forbearance on monthly payments on one loan of $120,000, and was in default on another.

Meese did not disclose the potential conflict of interest.

The Senior Staff Personnel Committee of which Meese was a member recommended that Thomas Barrack be appointed Assistant Secretary of Commerce. Barrack had arranged the sale of Meese's California home when Meese was in financial trouble and unable to sell it. Barrack contributed $83,000 to the sale.

Meese did not disclose his ties to Barrack in discussing his appointment.

Meese failed to report a $15,000 loan his wife got. The interest-free loan came from someone he appointed to public office.

It "never occurred to him" to report it, he said.

Although he knew his promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve would be irregular—he lacked the required educational background—Meese allowed others to obtain preferential treatment for him. During this period Meese called the Secretary of Defense to urge the reappointment of General Berkman, one of the people responsible for his promotion.

The nation's chief legal officer should have impeccable legal and ethical credentials. By contrast, the Independent Counsel's Report, sparked by the allegations into Meese's conduct, documents a clear pattern of insensitivity to the ethical standards of public office.

Meese may not be a crook, but neither does his record qualify him to be attorney general.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Jan. 26, 1985]

FURTHER QUESTIONS ON MR. MEESE

Another indication of Edwin Meese's unfitness to be attorney general has arisen just as the Senate prepares to hold new hearings on President Reagan's revived nomination of his friend to be the nation's top legal officer. Mr. Meese is seeking about $700,000 from the government to pay legal bills incurred in his own defense after his nomination last year—thus presenting the Justice Department with an awkward situation.

Commendably, the department has resolved it be challenging Mr. Meese's request as excessive and asserting that the Ethics in Government Act "does not require the use of the 'prevailing market rate.'" That stand is courageous, for Mr. Meese, if confirmed, will be in a position to retaliate against the Justice lawyers who are opposing his claim.

Reagan administration policy has been that lawyers who win cases against the government are entitled to fees of no more than $75 an hour. In fact, the president has supported legislation to set that upper limit. Now comes Mr. Meese with a personal request for nearly three-quarters of a million dollars in public funds to cover legal fees for lawyers who are reported to be asking up to $225 an hour. Small wonder that a three-judge court has ordered Mr. Meese to produce further information to document the validity of his claim.

Mr. Meese's exorbitant lawyer fee bill is just one more example of his apparent blindness to the impropriety of using his high White House position (counselor to the president) to advance his own interests. Similar ethical questions arose last year in connection with the original nomination of Mr. Meese. Although Independent Counsel Jacob Stein found "no basis" for a criminal indictment, he did not clear Mr. Meese of violating ethical standards set by Executive Order 11222 and federal ethics regulations applicable to all federal employees.

Indeed, Mr. Stein's report called attention to Mr. Meese's role in helping to get high government appointments for people who had helped him financially; his role in getting high level positions for people who helped him get a promotion in the Army Reserve despite a recommendation to the contrary; his repeated failures to report, as required by law, a $15,000 interest-free loan to his wife; and his memory lapses when he was asked about events that touched on his questionable conduct. Although Mr. Stein confined his own findings to the issue of criminal violations, he said there was "sufficient interest in those other issues (the ethical ones) to support an expectation that they will not remain unexplored."

When it opens hearings soon on the Meese nomination, the Senate Judiciary Committee should make sure that those ethical issues are further explored. And it should question Mr. Meese further about his role in trying to reverse longstanding denial of federal tax exemptions for segregated schools and his efforts to weaken federal support for voting rights. The nation's top law enforcement officer should support the law and set a higher ethical standard than Mr. Meese has.

THE MEESE OPPOSITION

The Providence (Rhode Island) Journal, noting the renomination of Edwin Meese for attorney general, says ". . . leftist journals used the Meese affair as an excuse to list all the Reagan appointees who had ever been charged with anything, however petty or unsubstantiated. The 'sleaze' factor became an early campaign issue."

Meese, as is well known by now, demanded an independent investigation of his financial and other affairs and in September a special prosecutor issued a 385-page report exonerating Meese.

"What the report actually says," the newspaper remarked in an editorial, "is that Edward Meese remains a conservative. That is what galls so many about his nomination. But Congress cannot reject—at least historically it has not rejected—presidential nominees for ideological reasons."

The newspaper seems to be missing one very valid point in last year's uproar over the Meese nomination.

Obviously, some in the media and Congress oppose Meese on ideological grounds. But others, many others, oppose Ronald Reagan's pal because they have a desire to see the nation's highest law enforcement officer possessing a much cleaner background.

The report found Meese guilty of no illegalities. But many ethical questions remain about Meese's finances and about past practices of cronyism.

If Meese's confirmation were blocked, the president would nominate another conservative, a fact plain to all those so-called "leftist journals." Other past Reagan nominees who were every bit as conservative as Meese were confirmed with no opposition. Many of the objections to Meese, as noted, deal with the post itself and the hope that the attorney general of the United States would have a "cleaner" past than Ed Meese.

But, then, one must admit it has become increasingly difficult to find those "clean" records in the nation's capital these days—on both sides of the political fence.

LOOK TO MEESE ETHICS

The Senate should reject the nomination of Edwin Meese to be attorney general, the nation's top law enforcement job, if it is established that his financial transactions have conflicted with his official duties. It is not enough to clear Meese of criminal wrongdoings. As attorney general, he is expected to meet the nation's highest standards of ethical conduct.

Leaks from the staff of the Office of Government Ethics, reported in a Wall Street Journal story, indicate that in two instances an independent study showed Meese suffered conflicts of personal and official duties. Why this report was not made public is another unanswered question for the Senate to ask when it begins its confirmation hearings Tuesday.

Meese's nomination had been on hold for almost a year pending completion of an investigation by a special prosecutor. This probe said it found no evidence justifying criminal charges. Yet, concern has grown about Meese's role in recommending friends for government jobs after they had loaned his family money. There were also his failure to list pertinent financial disclosure information and his curious memory lapses about large financial transactions.

Even if Meese's affairs did not tread on ethical standards, there is left a messy picture of personal disorganization that raises questions as to his competency for the attorney general's job.

Archibald Cox, the Watergate special prosecutor, has been spearheading a Common Cause drive to block the Meese nomination. Cox wrote recently that for the Senate to confirm Meese would be to declare that those seeking public office should feel "free to accept personal financial favors."

There is a certain irony in Meese's efforts to have taxpayers pick up the $750,000 legal bill he was charged by lawyers defending him in the investigation. The bill, charged at $250 an hour, came to more than twice what the government spent to investigate him. Meese has led the administration's efforts to kill legal services for the poor and to limit to $75 an hour what private attorneys who beat the government may charge.

Meese is in a real Catch-22. If he gets outside help to meet his legal bills, he risks violating the federal bribery laws. If the lawyers reduce their bill, they face charges of overbilling the government and Meese faces taxes on the net amount reduced as a gift of funds. Receiving a supplement to a federal salary also may violate the federal criminal code, making it risky for wealthy friends to come to his rescue. Some pickle for a prospective attorney general.

Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which will conduct the Meese hearing, have a responsibility to consider not just whether the attorney general is a crook, but whether his personal financial dealings symbolize the high standards of competence, honesty, integrity and freedom from self-serving deals that the nation's highest law enforcement office demands. If Meese fails these tests, he should not be confirmed.

[From the USA Today, Feb. 14, 1985]

MEESE MUST LIVE UP TO HIGHER STANDARDS

Edwin Meese, the president's choice for attorney general, is still on the griddle. On Tuesday the Senate Judiciary Committee will vote whether to confirm him.

Some senators will vote no. They agree with Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., that Meese's conduct, while not illegal, is "beneath the office" of the USA's top law officer.

Others, like Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, say the opposition to Meese is just partisan politics, from people "determined to assassinate a good man's character."

A special prosecutor said Meese did nothing illegal, but made no judgment on his ethics. Just what did Meese do?

While White House counselor, he accepted two loans arranged by his accountant, John McKean, who delayed some interest payments. Then—partly at Meese's urging—McKean got a full term on the U.S. Postal Board.

Meese's wife Ursula received an interest-free $15,000 loan from Edwin Thomas, which Meese initially failed to disclose. Thomas then got a White House job under Meese.

Meese was on a committee that recommended Thomas Barrack for assistant secretary of commerce. Barrack had used $70,000 of his own money to help sell Meese's home—but Meese never told other committee members.

The secretary of the Army alerted Meese that his reserve promotion to colonel would not be "regular and normal"—but Meese accepted it anyway.

How could Meese have been so blind? In contrast, the nomination of his colleague James Baker as Treasury secretary sailed through the Senate, partly because of Baker's unblemished ethical record.

Meese is not the first White House aide to be accused of ethical lapses; they have darkened many administrations.

He continues to insist that he has done nothing wrong. He should have learned, as most public officials learned long ago, that the appearance of impropriety can be as serious as impropriety itself. He says that if he had it all to do over again, he would do some things differently.

At worst, Meese is guilty of unethical behavior. At best, he is guilty of alarming insensitivity to ethical standards and sloppy management of his own affairs.

But it has been almost 30 years since the Senate refused to confirm a president's choice for a Cabinet position. The president, fresh from a landslide victory and enjoying high public approval, still wants Meese.

So it is likely Edwin Meese will become the nation's top law enforcement officer.

If confirmed, he will enter office under a cloud. To remove it, Meese has told the senators who questioned him that he will live by "different" standards in the future.

That must mean higher standards. For an attorney general, it is not enough simply to prove you are not a crook—the mere appearance of wrongdoing can undermine justice. And that's what Edwin Meese must understand.

[From the Bellevue (WA) Journal-American, Jan. 29, 1985]

MEESE UNFIT FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL

The continued bad judgment of Edwin Meese demonstrates that he is ill-suited to become attorney general of the United States.

Meese's nomination was put aside at his own request to permit a special prosecutor to look into charges that he accepted financial favors from people who later won federal jobs when Meese went to work in the Reagan White House. Armed with a finding that Meese had committed no indictable offense, the president decided to press ahead. Now Meese has billed the government for $720,000 in legal fees run up in his defense.

The government has some responsibility to defray his expenses. If it didn't, virtually any presidential nominee could be thwarted by a campaign of accusations serious enough, if true, to disqualify him. But Meese has brought this on himself. He hired top-price attorneys at $225 per hour. This is the man who, as a presidential counselor fought to put a $75 lid on the fees that could be claimed by attorneys who won cases against the government.

So Meese is in a bind. If the government pays his fees, it will establish a peculiar precedent regarding equality before the law. If wealthy friends bail him out, they will give him a substantial gift and create possible conflicts of interest. If his attorneys forgive part of their bill, they will raise questions of whether the elaborate documentation of their charges defrauded the government.

Meese's supporters will ask whether his critics mean to make it impossible for a person of modest means to serve in the Cabinet. But that is the wrong question. Meese is not everyman. He is committed to having champagne on a beer budget. If the Senate OKs his nomination and pays for his champagne, it had better not forget to smite taxpayers with the empty bottle.

[From the Toms River (NJ) Observer, Jan. 23, 1985]

UNIQUELY UNQUALIFIED

Ronald Reagan wants Ed Meese to be attorney general and, had it not been for those charges of impropriety, Meese probably would have been confirmed last spring. Now, with the special prosecutor's report in hand and the election over, Reagan has resubmitted Meese's name to a Republican-dominated Senate that's expected to confirm him.

A cynic may point out that, if confirmed, Meese would be just another in a long line of political hacks and presidential cronies who, at one time or another, have served as attorney general. But while that may speak to his lack of experience, if not his lack of competence, it does nothing to raise his ethical stature. And in this area he may well be uniquely unqualified.

[From the Barre-Montpelier (VT) Times-Argus, Jan. 30, 1985]

RUBBER-STAMP FOR MEESE

The American public deserves better than an attorney general who says he's not a crook but who cannot say with equal confidence "I am the best."

The best that President Reagan's nominee for attorney general, Edwin Meese III, can say is that he has not been indicted for anything and that he has been, and continues to be, a close personal friend of President Reagan. In between that has been a disturbing pattern of behavior ranging from the slippery, highly questionable handling of his personal finances while White House counselor and presidential adviser, to consistent attacks on basic civil rights, civil liberties and the poor.

Meese, with some success, has attacked the Legal Aid program, has helped weaken federal anti-discrimination laws as they apply to higher education, and has expressed arrogance bordering on contempt for the needy and those who defend them.

Meanwhile, he has asked taxpayers to pay the more than $720,000 in legal bills accumulated during his as-yet inconclusive defense of his ethical practices as White House counsel. And now he is trying to explain away a report in the Wall Street Journal that he was cleared of ethics charges in an Office of Government Ethics investigation only when the director of that office, after conferring with new White House counsel Fred F. Fielding, overruled two staff attorneys who had concluded otherwise.

Unfortunately, however, the quality and qualifications of presidential nominees for top cabinet posts have rarely seemed of much importance to most senators, including Vermont's own Sen. Robert T. Stafford. Whatever a president wants, a President usually gets from the Senate when the time to vote arrives, barring some smoking gun impossible for senators to ignore.

Meese, despite the fuss over highly questionable, if not indictable, behavior for a would-be attorney general, seems likely to join that long list of less-than-the-best appointees in the end.

What would make this an especially serious shirking of Senate responsibility, however, can be found in something President Reagan said the other day as he launched his second term: That he plans to use that term to reshape the nation "forever."

One of the ways a permanent reshaping of the nation could be accomplished, as other Presidents have demonstrated in the past for better and worse, is by using their attorneys general as political tools in the court rooms. Even for conservatives, whose ideology stands to gain the most if such a promise is kept, the Meese appointment should strike a disturbing chord, too. Conservatism is one thing, after all; abusing power by bending, undermining or failing to enforce laws to achieve a political end is something quite different.

[From the Delaware County Daily Times (PA) Feb. 5, 1985]

MEESE UNFIT

After a year of starts, stops and jump starts, the Senate Judiciary Committee is to vote today on whether to approve the nomination of Edwin Meese III to serve as Attorney General of the United States.

The support for the nomination comes primarily from Republicans, the opposition from Democrats (several of whom might oppose Snow White if she were nominated by a Republican president). As Republicans control the committee and the Senate, and as President Reagan regards this nomination as quite important, it may be assumed that the president is willing and able to indulge in enough horse-trading to ensure that Mr. Meese joins the cabinet.

Nonetheless, several Republican senators have not yet fallen into line, chief among them Pennsylvania's own U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter, who says "I'm going to think it all through" and decide after final testimony and argument today.

The senator is well-advised to think it all through, because Mr. Meese is not to be confused with Snow White. Ever since he's been hanging around the White House, Mr. Meese has been receiving money from folks who've been getting favors from the federal government.

He's been investigated extensively for approving federal jobs for his financial benefactors, for acquiring promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve and knocking down a $10,000 payment from a presidential transition organization.

His supporters state that Mr. Meese has been "vindicated" because a six-month examination of his activities concluded that there was not enough evidence to prosecute him for violating the law. As vindications go, this one's mighty weak. The investigator said only that he didn't have proof that Mr. Meese tried to break the laws on bribery and so forth, and he carefully refused to discuss the ethics, or lack of them, demonstrated by the nominee.

The character reference, in short, is this: "He hasn't been caught yet."

That's not good enough for Attorney General—the nation's top law enforcement official. After Senator Specter thinks it through today, he should vote "No" on the nomination.

[From the Chicago (IL) Southtown Economist, Jan. 15, 1985]

ETHICS AND MEESE

Once again conservatives are clamoring for the U.S. Senate to quickly confirm President Reagan's nomination of Edwin Meese III as U.S. attorney general.

The original hue and cry was silenced by allegations that Meese failed to disclose a $15,000 interest-free loan to his wife, mysteriously received a promotion in the Army Reserve and helped to get federal jobs for people who helped him financially.

A special prosecutor, Jacob A. Stein, was appointed to investigate the accusations and after a lengthy investigation found nothing illegal in Meese's behavior.

However, Stein's findings do not mean that Meese's conduct was ethical.

Common Cause, the organization that brought some of the original accusations against Meese, isn't satisfied. it says the Senate should refuse to confirm the nomination on the grounds that Meese is "blind" to ethical standards.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is expected to recommend that the full Senate confirm Meese when the issue is taken up later this month.

While he was Reagan's presidential counselor, Meese was known for making statements that outraged civil libertarians across the country.

His apparent willingness to accept financial favors, while legal, demonstrates a naivity we don't like to see in a nominee for attorney general.

Rather than quickly confirming his nomination, we hope the Senate takes its time in pondering Meese's personal conduct. Meese's political philosophy doesn't bother us as much as his convenient short-sightedness.

Certainly there is a conservative somewhere in the land who is better qualified to be attorney general.

[From The Houston Post, Jan. 29, 1985]

WE CAN DO BETTER

Today the Senate Judiciary Committee is to begin hearings on the nomination of Edwin Meese to be U.S. attorney general. The senators should take a hard, close look at what is being offered.

Last year, when President Reagan first offered up Meese for the job, a number of allegations were made against the nominee. An independent counsel, Jacob Stein, was appointed to investigate. He concluded that there was "no basis" for a criminal indictment.

That sounds as if it should remove any objection to Meese as the nation's chief legal officer—but look at what Stein did find:

Meese nominated to the Postal Board of Governors a man to whom he owed $72,000—$12,000 of it in arrears. The other members of the nominating panel apparently were never told of the loans.

After a friend helped obtain the sale on very favorable terms of Meese's California home—in fact throwing more than $80,000 of his own money into the deal—Meese was one of four officials recommending the man for assistant secretary of commerce. He did not reveal the link.

After receiving forbearance of $120,000 in monthly loan payments to a bank, Meese helped get officials of that bank named to high government positions. Again, there was no mention of a possible conflict of interest.

Meese took a lucrative hurry-up promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve even after the secretary of the Army pointed out to him that the move would not be a "regular and normal affair."

The list goes on, but the pattern is clear: Here is a man devoid of any sense of ethical propriety or awareness about conflicts of interest. As recently as Monday, it was revealed that an Office of Government Ethics staff report found specific ethics violations in two of Meese's dealings. Even now, his claim for $720,000 in legal fees related to Stein's investigation is being challenged by the very Justice Department that Meese would head if confirmed.

The very least that can be said about Meese as attorney general is that he would set a truly awful example—hardly the type of leadership the country needs.

We urge the senators to reject this nomination. The president can surely find a better nominee—one with both a good legal mind and an understanding of ethical conduct.

[From the Hartford Courant, Jan. 30, 1985]

MR. MEESE AND RED HERRINGS

Edwin Meese III, who wants to be attorney general, entered the Senate Judiciary Committee's hearing room Tuesday amid a school of red herring. The panel members will serve the country best by emulating well-trained beagles, keeping their noses on the trail despite all those interesting smells.

It might help for the Senators to concentrate on their duty in assessing presidential choices. It isn't to sit as a kind of supreme court, ruling merely whether nominees are guilty of this or that legal or regulatory sin. They work on a higher plane. Their job is to decide—applying standards that consider adherence to laws and rules, but also transcend them—whether nominees are fit to hold the offices they seek.

Until Monday, the Meese record seemed to be on the table. Then The Wall Street Journal reported that two lawyers in the Office of Government Ethics had concluded that Mr. Meese violated federal ethical regulations in connection with two financial arrangements.

The staff memo, if divulged, was certain to give ammunition to Mr. Meese's opponents. Perhaps that's why there seems to have been no intention to let that happen. Although the memo was discussed with Mr. Meese's lawyer and with White House counsel Fred F. Fielding, it wasn't given to the Judiciary Committee until the committee asked for it.

The staff lawyers' conclusion was overridden by their boss, the director of the ethics office, David H. Martin—a Reagan appointee. In a letter to the committee chairman, Sen. Strom Thurmond, Mr. Martin declared that Mr. Meese "is in compliance with applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest."

Why was the staff memo suppressed? Should Mr. Martin, as head of a supposedly independent agency, have discussed it with a White House lawyer? Given Mr. Meese's propensity for appearing in situations that at least raise questions about impropriety, and given the broad sweep of the ethics rules, is there sufficient reason for the clean bill of health given him by Mr. Martin? These are all questions worth discussing.

But in broad context, they're red herrings, no more important than the president's eagerness to get Mr. Meese confirmed or the November election landslide or Mr. Meese's long ordeal or even the conclusion of independent counsel Jacob A. Stein that Mr. Meese shouldn't be prosecuted for criminal misconduct.

With enough beaglelike persistence, the senators will soon end the hunt. They will find that Mr. Meese's weak professional qualifications make him a poor choice to head the nation's biggest law firm. They will see that his lack of ethical sensitivity, profusely illustrated in the Stein report, is incompatible with the unique office to which he aspires.

For the Senate to make Mr. Meese attorney general would be for it to say that the quality of the highest officials in the federal government isn't very important. To say that is to render the confirmation process meaningless.

[From the New Kensington (PA) Valley News Dispatch, Jan. 22, 1985]

MEESE NOMINATION SHOULD BE REJECTED

President Reagan has resubmitted the nomination of Edwin Meese III to be Attorney General, and Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on the confirmation are to begin Jan. 29.

We hope the full Senate rejects the nomination of Meese.

After Reagan first submitted Meese's nomination early last year, a series of allegations against Meese led to the appointment of an independent counsel. That counsel concluded last September that there was "no basis" to support a criminal indictment of Meese. Reagan hailed the report as a vindication of Meese.

Far from it. A Common Cause review of the independent counsel's report, released in December, showed the report portrays a man who has violated basic standards of conduct for government public officials. The only vindication is that the report does not warrant filing a criminal charge against Meese.

The five-month investigation by the independent counsel examined 11 charges against Meese, including the connection between his acceptance of financial favors and his help in appointing his benefactors to high-level federal positions.

It concluded there was "no basis" for prosecuting Meese under federal criminal law, but the counsel explicitly refused to say "that the evidence does not substantiate the loose charges of moral turpitude against Meese," despite the repeated pleading of Meese's counsel.

Common Cause said the report demonstrates that Meese is "blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official," and should not be confirmed as Attorney General.

As The New York Times observed in a December 1984 editorial, "To be cleared of criminal suspicion is a relief but not a qualification for high office."

There may indeed be nothing illegal about a government official conferring public rewards on those who have done him private favors, but such actions are ethically indefensible. Especially in one who would hope to become the chief law enforcement officer in the country.

The Attorney General is the chief legal officer of the nation, and more than any person other than the president has the responsibility to set the ethical tone of an administration. High ethical standards are necessary to maintaining public confidence in the even-handedness of the law—an essential ingredient to democracy.

Ed Meese through his public conduct does not meet those qualifications.

He is a poor choice to be Attorney General and he should be rejected.

It's not enough for the Attorney General to say "I'm not a crook," He has to be much more than that.

[From the Ottawa (KS) Herald, Jan. 1985]

GOOD-BUDDYISM

Archibald Cox, the high-minded Watergate prosecutor, says Edwin Meese is unfit to be U.S. Attorney General.

He's right about that, but not necessarily for the reasons he cites.

Cox is most concerned about Meese's "utter insensitivity to ethical standards."

That's a valid point. When ethics were ladled out, Meese was playing golf. But Washington's hide is well-scarred with character lapse.

Even more to the point in the Meese nomination are his professional qualifications. To say the kindest, they are modest.

Meese was deputy district attorney of California's Alameda County. He directed a Center for Criminal Justice Policy at San Diego school of law.

That's it, so far as law goes. Yet he is slated to be our top law official.

We have hundreds of men and women who are better grounded in law and the Constitution. No, we have thousands.

Meese is a businessman, trouble-shooter, and politician. He also is a good buddy of the President.

He qualifies to be "crony-general," as the Chicago Tribune puts it. But is good-buddyism the way to pick cabinet officials?

[From the Boston Globe, Jan. 29, 1985]

THE ETHICS OF EDWIN MEESE

The air of shoddiness and concealment that surrounds the financial transactions of Edwin Meese, President Reagan's nominee for Attorney General, is thickening. In an Office of Government Ethics staff report, two agency lawyers have concluded that Meese violated federal ethics standards in two financial dealings. The report was suppressed by the agency's director, David H. Martin, after he talked to Meese's lawyers and Reagan officials, according to an article in yesterday's Wall Street Journal.

The report was based on an evaluation of the 385 pages of findings by Jacob Stein, who conducted the original, independent investigation of Meese last year. Stein concluded that Meese was not guilty of an indictable offense.

The Ethics Office lawyers, however, concluded that Meese violated federal standards prohibiting an official from taking action that "might create the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person." The same standards urge officials not to give the impression that they are acting with anything other than "complete independence or impartiality. . . ."

The lawyers concluded that Meese violated these standards when he was involved in helping get federal jobs for John R. McKean, who lent Meese $40,000, and for Thomas Barrack, who sold Meese's California home under extraordinarily favorable terms.

Martin's attempt to keep this information secret raises new questions about how the Meese affair has been handled. His meeting with Meese's lawyers may have been legal and proper, but the decision not to disclose the report by his staff creates more suspicion.

Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on the nomination are scheduled to begin today. Chairman Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) has wisely decided to call Martin and the two lawyers as witnesses.

In light of the disclosures, the committee should not rush through the hearing without thoroughly examining the Ethics Office report—which deals with how a nominee for the highest law enforcement office in the land looks at the law—and the reasons it has been concealed so long.

So far, only Sen. Howard Metzenbaum of Ohio has said he will vote against the nomination. Now, however, Meese's supporters on the committee may also find that the report has a dampening effect on their enthusiasm.

[From the Chicago Tribune, Jan. 30, 1985]

THE CASE AGAINST MR. MEESE

A great many irrelevant questions have been asked about Edwin Meese, President Reagan's nominee for attorney general, and most have been answered. It is now time for the Senate Judiciary Committee to ask the relevant one: Is Mr. Meese qualified for this post? The answer is no.

A special counsel concluded after a five-month investigation that Mr. Meese is not a crook, and administration spokesmen seem to think that that fully establishes his claim to the post. It does not.

Mr. Meese's principal claim to the office is his loyalty to Ronald Reagan. That ought to be considered a liability for an attorney general nominee. In Mr. Meese's case there aren't any balancing qualifications. His close identification with President Reagan's partisan interests makes it hard to have confidence that he will show independence in making the difficult, principled decisions an attorney general must make. Furthermore, he simply does not have the legal stature that is expected of the nation's chief law enforcement official. With all the distinguished conservative lawyers and judges in the United States, why should the Justice Department be entrusted to Mr. Meese?

His nomination has been troubled from the beginning. Unfortunately, most of the complaints have centered on questions about whether he violated legal or ethical standards while working as one of President Reagan's key advisers in the White House. There have been two recent developments on that score that continue to cloud the debate.

First, a federal court is considering his request to have the government pay the attorneys who represented him during the investigation of his financial affairs. Under the 1978 Ethics in Government Act, officials may be reimbrused for lawyers' fees incurred as a result of investigation by indepedent counsels. The Justice Department has challenged the request, and a court must now decide whether or how much the government must pay Mr. Meese's lawyers. It is an awkward situation for everyone, but not germane to whether he should be confirmed.

The other development relates to a report by two staff members of the Office of Government Ethics, rejected by their boss, accusing Mr. Meese of violating government ethics standards. Again, this complicated and probably unresolvable matter should not obscure the genuine questions about Mr. Meese's legal stature and political independence.

Mr. Meese may have been unjustly maligned thanks to all the attention focused on his financial affairs. But even if he never violated a law or regulation, he would still be a bad choice as attorney general.

[From the Dayton Daily News, Dec. 29, 1985]

SPECIAL PROBE MAKES CASE AGAINST MEESE LOOK BETTER

On the assumption that some Americans have not read the 400-page report issued by Independent Counsel Benjamin Stein on the matter of Ed Meese, Common Cause has offered a summary of it. This turns out to be a more useful act than it might seem.

News accounts about the Stein report correctly emphasized that it found Mr. Meese guilty of no crimes. Those accounts reports said—secondarily—that Mr. Stein did not clear Mr. Meese of any ethical transgressions; the Stein report limited itself to legal issues.

That's all accurate as far as it goes. But a look at the Stein report that is any more than cursory reveals this: The report tends to confirm the slew of charges made against Mr. Meese in various press reports and in congressional testimony.

The dubious act happened, Mr. Stein said. They just don't happen to be illegal. Mr. Stein reported that he had no proof that, for example, "Mr. Meese solicited (or accepted) a loan . . . with the express or implied intention of assisting (the lender) in obtaining a government position." Again and again throughout the report, the matter of intent surfaces as the stumbling block in any prosecution.

But the facts are not disputed.

Now picture Mr. Meese as attorney general. Suppose, suggests Common Cause, "that . . . some high official in the White House had supported individuals . . . for important government positions after he had received unusual financial assistance from them or (their organizations). Could Mr. Meese . . . be expected to press a vigorous investigation?" Would a young lawyer in Justice feel free to propose that?

Suppose somebody took gifts. "Could Mr. Meese be expected to see anything wrong in such conduct?" Could the public expect strong action?

If, every time an ethical issue arises, the attorney general has to ask himself whether strong action will subject him to the charge of hypocrisy, then the cause of justice is not served. And the cause of justice is what the attorney generalship is all about.

Mr. Meese came under severe financial stress in the early 1980s, primarily the result of his difficulty in selling his California house. He was not using the various financial favors he received to get rich. That fact deserves some place in these proceedings.

He should not be sent to jail. Mr. Meese should not be fined. He should not be an object of contempt. He should not be blackballed from gainful employment. He should not be attorney general.

[From the Missoula (MT) Missoulian, Jan. 29, 1985]

SENATE SHOULD REJECT MEESE'S CONFIRMATION

(By Sam Reynolds)

The Senate Judiciary Committee, on which Sen. Max Baucus sits, today begins its hearings on the nomination of Edwin Meese III to become attorney general.

Strenuous objections are rising against the appointment. The objections, outlined in detail on this page today by Archibald Cox, rest not on political opposition to the president. After all, another top White House aide, James A. Baker III, recently received unanimous backing from a Senate committee to become secretary of the treasury.

Nor are questions raised that Meese is an incompetent lawyer, or has offended special interests, or beaten his wife or kicked his dog.

The opposition against Meese rests on the question of ethics. The man has committed acts that a public servant even marginally sensitive to ethical standards avoids. He has received financial favors and participated in personnel decisions that, while not illegal in themselves, are direct conflicts of interest.

Is this the man the U.S. Senate should confirm to become the nation's top law enforcement officer? Obviously not.

The allegations against Meese are not based on hearsay. They were brought out by an exhaustive examination of the facts by a special prosecuter, Jacob A. Stein. Stein was appointed last year to investigate Meese to determine whether the president's counsel had committed any criminal acts.

No, concluded Stein, Meese had broken no laws. But Stein declined to comment on the propriety of what Meese had done or how fit he was to serve as attorney general. Stein's investigation was limited to whether Meese could be prosecuted.

But the facts about the favors Meese had received and dispensed were presented in Stein's report. They are damning to a person who would be the nation's attorney general.

There's more to it than that. There is another fear, involving the same worries that count against Meese's confirmation as attorney general. The other fear has to do with the Supreme Court.9

Meese is known to aspire to appointment as a Supreme Court justice. Two or more Supreme Court seats are expected to fall vacant during President Reagan's second term.

There's little doubt that if Meese, despite his dismal ethical record, can survive the Senate confirmation process and become attorney general, he would be able to survive a second confirmation process and become a justice.

The thought of such a sleaze serving as the president's legal counsel is bad enough, but can be swallowed. The president may surround himself with anyone he wants. The thought of the man becoming attorney general is deeply disturbing, for the reasons Cox presents so well. The thought of his becoming a Supreme Court justice is intolerable.

Stop it, now. Let Meese return to duty at the White House, if that suits him and the president. But he should not be advanced any further up the ladder of public responsibility, dragging with him, as he always will, the baggage of an ethically tainted past.

Baucus should oppose Meese's confirmation in committee. Both he and Sen. John Melcher should vote against confirmation if it reaches the Senate floor.

QUESTIONS ABOUT MEESE

(It is not enough for a man who is attorney general to have a sign saying I have been found not to be a crook.—Archibald Cox, Common Cause chairman.)

Although a few weeks remain before Ed Meese's nomination for U.S. attorney general will be resubmitted to Congress, opposition is already beginning to line up.

The Common Cause organization has little use for Meese's promotion from his post of White House adviser to attorney general and is dissatisfied with what it regards as the limited perspective of a special prosecutor, who concluded earlier this year that Meese's conduct, involving allegations of awarding jobs to persons who provided him with financial or other assistance, did not violate any criminal laws.

There are plenty of reasons for the Senate to examine the questions raised. Common Cause has a point when it asserts that it is not enough to have an attorney general who has not been formally accused of committing a crime but whose background is questionable. After all, the job to be filled is that of the top law enforcement officer in the land, not some minor penny-ante bureaucratic post.

Senators should keep that in mind and resist any temptation to rush the nomination through simply to allow President Reagan to have his way.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 29, 1985]

MR. MEESE DOESN'T MEASURE UP

Eleven months have passed since Edwin Meese went before the Senate Judiciary Committee seeking confirmation as Attorney General. Though slight of legal stature, he had the warm endorsement of a popular President and seemed easily confirmable. But questions arose about his fitness for that office, serious enough to require a special investigation by an independent counsel. The counsel concluded that none of the charges warranted a criminal indictment, so the President renewed the nomination. This week the Senate returns to the crucial question: What qualifies Mr. Meese for this job?

There is much to be said for letting Presidents have their choice in Cabinet officers. But unless the qualifications are cut to fit the candidate, Mr. Meese is not a desirable choice. Some senators seem in no mood to measure the nominee. For them the key factors now are President Reagan's landslide re-election and the independent counsel's report that Mr. Meese has done nothing criminal. Yet senators, in voting to confirm or reject, should apply a higher standard of what the Attorney General ought to be.

The person entrusted with the Department of Justice need not be a legal scholar or master of every legal specialty under his direction. But he should be learned in the law and have distinguished himself in its practice and application. Moreover, he should aspire to be the conscience of any Administration, guiding the President in setting its ethical and moral tone. He should become not only the President's advocate but also his chief legal adviser, ready to give the unwelcome advice that the law limits his client's power.

When visible, Mr. Meese's approach to the law has been aggressively opportunistic. As White House counselor, he sought to wipe out years of gains in civil rights by restoring tax exemptions to schools that discriminate against blacks. Even at the risk of abusing executive power, he led the effort to sabotage Congress' repeated affirmation of a law creating a Federal program of lawyers for poor people. Without a trace of courtesy to a responsible adversary, he kept calling the American Civil Liberties Union a "criminals' lobby."

In explaining his failure to report financial favors by benefactors who then obtained Government jobs, Mr. Meese convinced the independent counsel, Jacob Stein, that he attaches no legal significance to some of these transactions, and simply could not remember others. That negates criminal intent but it does not make Mr. Meese a bloodhound when it comes to questionable conduct in high office.

The nation has endured some undistinguished Attorneys General. It has also been blessed with some whose achievements in law enforcement, civil rights and the protection of liberties marked them for honor. Mr. Meese represents a throwback to the kind of Attorney General the last Watergate prosecutor warned against: the political manager, the Presidential buddy.

The standard for performance in this critical job has been rising. Mr. Meese doesn't measure up.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Jan. 31, 1985]

THE RECORD WARNS SENATE TO GO SLOW ON MR. MEESE

The more that the fitness of Edwin Meese 3d to be attorney general is examined in public, the more it appears that he doesn't have what it takes to be the nation's chief law-enforcement officer. Thus, the Senate Judiciary Committee should not be in any hurry to vote on his confirmation.

Lapses in ethical standards keep cropping up. They are lapses that the public has every reason to expect Mr. Meese would have avoided—if not as result of his long experience as a public official, then certainly by virtue of his being the President's choice to head the Department of Justice.

Nevertheless, before the Judiciary Committee re-opened hearings on his nomination Tuesday there were new charges raised by a staff report of the Office of Government Ethics, charges that were changed after David H. Martin, director of the office, consulted the White House and Mr. Meese's attorneys. And there was Mr. Meese testifying on one hand that he had met "ethical as well as legal" standards of conduct for public officials and on the other hand that he has "a much higher sensitivity to these matters now than when I arrived in Washington."

Mr. Meese's nomination has been hanging fire for almost a year. A court-appointed independent counsel investigated 11 allegations of improprieties and found that Mr. Meese had not violated any federal laws, but he expressly did not pass judgment on whether Mr. Meese was fit to be attorney general. That question is now before the Judiciary Committee.

Lest anyone think that question is being raised as a smokescreen to embarrass the President, let it be pointed out that on Tuesday the Senate unanimously confirmed Mr. Reagan's nominee for Treasury secretary, James A. Baker 3d.

No, the question is a real one. It is critical especially because the attorney general not only must decide sensitive ethical questions in the government's handling of civil and criminal cases, but also is almost on the same level as the President in setting an administrations' ethical tone. The committee, whose members include Pennsylvania's Arlen Specter and Delaware's Joseph R. Biden Jr., must shake out this entire matter before voting. On the record that exists, that should not be done quickly.

[From the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, Jan. 29, 1985]

MEESE'S LEGAL BILL TOO STEEP

We are beginning to lose patience with White House counselor Edwin Meese. Meese, President Reagan's choice for attorney general, has just presented the government with the $720,000 bill his lawyers charged him for representation when independent counsel Jacob Stein investigated Meese's propensity for borrowing money from people who later ended up with government jobs.

It seems Meese's principal attorneys, Leonard Garment and E. Robert Wallach, charge $250 an hour. Their tab comes to more than twice the $320,000 it cost the government for the investigation. Garment and Wallach, it turns out, decided that they must not cut their rate for Meese lest they be accused of trying to gain special favors from a future attorney general. Somehow we have no more sympathy for them than we do for their client.

It's reasonable to provide for reasonable government payments to be made in such cases. Otherwise, frivolous accusations could bar all but the wealthy from the pressure cooker process of being nominated for top government jobs. But the Meese tab is clearly excessive, and its presentation to taxpayers—most of whom earn far less than $250 an hour—is an act of arrogance and poor judgment.

Since it is clear Meese could not afford to hire such limousine attorneys, it's fair to ask why he did not use the time-honored, consumer-wise tactic of consulting the yellow pages for more reasonable services. Simultaneously, he has been endorsing a proposal to place a $75-an-hour limit on fees paid to lawyers who successfully sue the government and are entitled to taxpayer reimbursement.

Meese's actions in this matter don't speak well for the way he would handle himself as the top law enforcement officer in the land. Now that he has taken us all to this sorry point, if seems only a mess can result. Meese is asking lawyers in the Justice Department who presumably will be his subordinates to judge in his favor. They probably will compromise and pay only part of the bill, and that makes sense. But if his attorneys reduce whatever sum is left to pay, then they could run afoul of bribery statutes. If friends pick up the bill for him they could be stopped by the same statutes.

All this occurs just as the Senate is preparing to whisk Meese through the confirmation process and as David H. Martin, director of the Office of Government Ethics, confirms that his staff found Meese violated ethical standards in two of his questionable transactions. Martin said that after he met with Meese's lawyers he decided against taking further action persuant to this staff's findings.

Is Meese indictable? No. Are his ethical standards acceptable? Very debatable.

[From the West Palm Beach (FL) Post, Jan. 17, 1985]

MEESE LACKS QUALIFICATIONS

It has been nearly a year since President Ronald Reagan nominated his good friend Edwin Meese to succeed his good friend William French Smith as U.S. attorney general.

When he was nominated last January, Meese picked up immediate opposition on the grounds that his professional qualifications to head the mighty Justice Department were virtually invisible. Later, as the Senate began the investigation that normally precedes its confirmation hearings, facts emerged that indicate his unfitness for the job for more substantive reasons.

The investigation by a special counsel showed that Meese repeatedly did favors for people who had lent him money. The favors took the form of appointments to federal jobs or government office, an area in which Meese had great influence as special counsel to the president.

Ultimately, the special counsel concluded that he found " . . . no basis for the bringing of a (criminal) prosecution . . . " The White House thereupon began acting as though Meese had been cleared of all wrongdoing. So have certain Republican senators who are anxious to get the matter behind them.

What they gloss over is the fact that the special counsel was asked to say that the evidence " . . . did not substantiate the loose charges of moral turpitude against Mr. Meese," but he refused to go beyond that, just as he refused to evaluate Meese's fitness for public office. He said those questions were beyond his jurisdiction.

They are not beyond the jurisdiction of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which will resume hearings on the Meese appointment in two weeks. The committee must ask whether someone of Meese's background is fit to serve as the nation's chief law enforcement officer.

Archibald Cox, chairman of Common Cause, said the special counsel's report shows that Meese "is blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official." Cox has it right.

[From the Anniston (AL) Star Jan. 8, 1985]

MEESE AND ETHICS

Both of Alabama's senators sit on the Sentate Judiciary Committee, the committee that passes on the president's nominations for high federal office. Both are men of high ethical principles.

To be true to those principles, both Sens. Howell Heflin and Jeremiah Denton should vote against the nomination of Edwin Meese III to be attorney general of the United States.

Mr. Meese's qualifications as an attorney for this post are questionable, but they are not the problem. Normally a president should be granted wide latitude in selecting his Cabinet officers. But he should not be permitted to place in the top law-enforcement position in the nation a person with questionable ethical standards, a man who accepted favors from those he helped through White House connections.

The questions raised about Meese were sufficiently serious that an independent counsel was appointed to review his situation. That counsel, Jacob Stein, issued his report last September, concluding that there was "no basis" for indicting Meese on criminal charges. He found there was no identifiable connection between the favors granted Meese by various friends, and his favors to those same friends.

There may be no connection. It is not suggested here that Mr. Meese necessarily sold government appointments for financial favors. Nonetheless he assisted those who helped him gain federal appointments. At the very least his conduct showed poor judgment and undermined the high ethical standards expected of White House officials.

According to federal regulations, "It is equally important that each employee (of the Executive Office of the President) avoid becoming involved in situations which present the possibility, or even the appearance, that his official position might be used to his private advantage."

Mr. Meese accepted a $40,000 loan from a man he then supported for nomination to the board of governors of the U.S. Postal Service. His wife accepted a $15,000 loan from another man who subsequently became Meese's assistant in the White House. Yet another man who arranged the sale of Messe's house, using some of his own money, was proposed as an assistant secretary by a four-member senior staff committee which included Edwin Meese.

Mr. Meese intervened to urge the reappointment to head the Army Reserve of a general who had approved an irregular promotion of Meese to colonel in the Army Reserve.

President Reagan characterized the report of the independent counsel as a "vindication" of Meese.

Yet Mr. Stein, the independent counsel, was asked to say, ". . . that the evidence does not substantiate the loose charges of moral turpitude against Mr. Meese." He refused. He was asked to make an "evaluation of (Meese's) fitness for public office." He refused.

Lack of evidence of violation of criminal statutes is one thing. Compliance with the ethical requirements of high office is quite another.

Edwin Meese II should not head the Department of Justice of the United States.

[From the Astoria (OR) Daily Astorian Jan. 3, 1985]

WE ASKED FOR IT

The citizens' lobby, Common Cause, and its chairman, Archibald Cox, are right about Edwin Meese, but they cannot expect Congress to do their bidding. Members of Congress always have been reluctant to oppose the president in the choice of a member of his Cabinet, and that's the way it will be with Meese.

Nevertheless, Common Cause and Cox have served a useful purpose in declaring that Meese is not qualified to be attorney general simply because a special prosecutor concluded there was "no basis for the bringing of criminal prosecution against President Reagan's choice to head the Justice Department."

We are well-served by being reminded by Cox that "The uncontradicted evidence in the (special prosecutor's) report shows that Mr. Meese repeatedly participated in appointing to high government positions individuals who had done or were doing him financial favors or who were affiliated with a bank that had done him financial favors."

It is important to make this point because while it will not prevent the appointment of Meese as attorney general it should give the president pause when he considers nominating the man for the next opening on the Supreme Court.

The Reagan administration has exhibited a degree of sleaziness exceeded only by that of the Nixon administration, whose leader had to resign and several of whose employees went to prison. At last count, some 45 Reagan appointees had to leave government because of their sleazy ethical standards.

The head of the Justice Department should be as clean as a hound's tooth. Instead we get Edwin Meese, an old Reagan crony, whose ethics have been suspect for a long time. To complain is useless. We're getting what we deserve. We asked for it.

[From the Austin (TX) American-Statesman, Jan. 1, 1985]

MEESE NOT QUALIFIED

President Reagan is expected to once again nominate Edwin Meese as attorney general when Congress convenes. But the presidential counsel is no more fit for that high office now than before he was "cleared" of violating federal law after a five-month investigation. Meese's nomination should be rejected.

A year ago, Meese was nominated to be attorney general. Within three months, because of information revealed in the press and during hearings on his nomination, a preliminary investigation of possible criminal charges against the nominee began. Later, an independent counsel was selected to investigate thoroughly.

In September, the counsel's report was released. It concluded there was "no basis" for indicting Meese on criminal charges. Mr. Reagan claimed the report was a "vindication" of Meese.

But, as Common Cause chairman Archibald Cox has said, the report is no such thing. A Common Cause review of the counsel's report notes that it carefully refused to state that the evidence does not substantiate the charge of moral turpitude or to make an evaluation of Meese's fitness for public office.

Indeed, the conclusion that can be taken from the counsel report is that Meese has very little sensitivity to the sort of ethical standards to be expected of an attorney general.

[From the Beaumont Enterprise, (TX) Dec. 22, 1984]

REAGAN SHOULD LIFT MEESE NOMINATION

America's top law enforcement officer never should have to prove his innocence of charges that he misused his position or influence.

Yet, that is what presidential counselor Edwin Meese III—President Reagan's choice to be the nation's new attorney general—has been forced to do.

Despite being cleared of criminal wrongdoing by an investigation into whether he improperly obtained government jobs for friends, Meese is no more qualifed to join the Cabinet now than he was when the questions first arose.

The citizens public interest lobby Common Cause, certainly no friend of the Reagan administration, has issued a report of its own that condemns the Meese nomination. Common Cause chairman Archibald Cox, the former Watergate special prosecutor, said the group's study reveals Meese's "utter insensitivity to ethical standards critical to confidence in government."

Meese's nomination came under fire last year when an investigation looked into allegations that his wife spent government money for personal use and charges that Meese used his influence in the administration to win favors for friends. But just last September, a special prosecutor who investigated Meese said he found "no basis . . . for the bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese for the violation of a federal criminal statute."

However, the prosecutor did not deny that Meese did the things for which he was investigated. He said only that he saw no grounds for prosecution.

All right, Meese is not a criminal.

But that does not automatically qualify him to be attorney general of the United States.

Too many questions remain from the investigation into Meese's conduct for him to serve in a post that requires absolute trust.

Characteristically, the president has vowed to stick with his nominee and says he will present his name to the Senate once more for consideration. he should, however, withdraw his good friend's name.

The president surely can find someone with impeccable professional and ethical qualifications. Ed Meese simply does not fit that description.

[From the Boston Globe, Dec. 22, 1984]

MEESE'S DEFEAT: A COMMON CAUSE

Archibald Cox, chairman of Common Cause, and his organization are to be admired for taking on the uphill fight to get the Senate to reject President Reagan's expected nomination of Edwin Meese as the nation's top law enforcement officer.

Meese is a man of questionable integrity and is not fit to be Attorney General of the United States. He has been accused of helping to arrange positions in the Reagan Administration for persons from whom he received financial assistance. Meese denies any wrong-doing. The facts are clear—Meese received financial help from five persons, all of whom subsequently got jobs in the Administration.

An independent counsel was appointed to investigate the charges last spring after Meese was nominated to replace Attorney General William French Smith. The counsel, Jacob A. Stein, found no basis for criminal prosecution of Meese. He did not comment on the propriety of Meese's behavior or on his fitness to be Attorney General.

Meese was not vindicated by the Stein report. If anything, the report proved that Meese's accounts of his financial machinations were less than forthright. Senators should read and take heed of a 37-page analysis of the Stein report by Common Cause.

Reagan says he intends to nominate Meese again when Congress reconvenes. The Senate Judiciary Committee is expected to begin hearings on the nomination late next month.

The Administration's disregard for facts and ethics, while inexcusable, is well-known. A series of resignations and embarrassments involving Reagan officials has done nothing to deter the President from demonstrating loyalty to persons who have proved to be lacking in integrity.

There is no excuse, however, for the Senate to stand aside while President Reagan continues to be blind to the implications of his appointments. Representatives and senators must join Common Cause and Sen. Howard Metzenbaum of Ohio in encouraging Meese to seek employment elsewhere.

[From the Bristol (CT) Press, Dec. 28, 1984]

CLEARING THE MEESE MESS

After months of delay, Senate Republicans appear confident that presidential adviser Ed Meese can be confirmed as attorney general. Without doubt, the confidence is well founded.

Still, rejection would be best for the country. There are several reasons that Meese should be denied the office, and no amount of political maneuvering can change that.

Forget his assertion that poor people stand in soup kitchen lines because they want "free food." Technically, he's correct. If they could afford to pay for their food, you can bet they would. Meese suspects that these are people out to rip off the system. In fact, they're those who have been ripped off by the system—who literally cannot afford a meal. But a warped perspective on hunger in America doesn't disqualify a candidate for attorney general.

This is, after all, the man who once referred to the American Civil Liberties Union as a "criminals' lobby," Granted, Ed Meese is entitled to an opinion. All the same, his words indicate a woeful inability to understand the principles inherent in the Bill of Rights. Safeguards exist not to protect criminals, but to protect everyone. One searches Meese's record in vain for a sense that he has grasped that argument.

Then, too, there was his maneuvering to win a tax exemption for Bob Jones University—the Segregated, theological academy based in South Carolina. As a presidential aide, Meese was perhaps following the wishes of the White House. Still, such exemptions violate both law and precedent. Does the nation need an attorney general who is willing to do that?

Meese's backers are so confident partly because their nominee has been "cleared" by a special prosecutor investigating charges that he traded in high-level appointments for President Reagan's political friends. Still, there are indications that he was less than honest in hearings before the Judiciary Committee. Besides, it's indisputable that the Reagan appointment policy has rested upon a base of patronage.

None of this means, of course, that Ed Meese will be rejected. It does suggest strongly, though, exactly why he should not be allowed to become attorney general.

[From the Charleston, (WV) Gazette, Dec. 28, 1984]

MEESE MESS

The Attorney General of the United States should be a person of unquestioned integrity. Such individuals are available. Numberless lawyers and politicians are honorable.

Why, then, is the White House determined to hand the nation's top legal office to a card-carrying member in the Reagan administration's sleaze gang?

Although a special prosecutor concluded that Edwin Meese committed no crime for which he could be indicted, his conduct wasn't honorable. He got loans from at least five Californians. Such cash he neglected to report, as demanded by law. Worse, five lenders were appointed by the White House to federal posts.

Former Watergate prosecutor Archibald Cox, now chairman of Common Cause, says Meese's failure to object to federal jobs being offered to private benefactors shows him to be morally unfit to be attorney general.

Why do so many appointees to this key federal office have feet of clay.

The present officeholder, William French Smith, had to return a dubious $50,000 bonus provided by a corporation, had to drop a tax shelter that netted him a $66,000 deduction for a $16,500 investment, and his round-the-world drug enforcement junket may have set a new record for squandering while traveling on supposed government business.

Former Attorney General Richard Kleindienst was convicted of misleading a Senate committee, got $250,000 "finder fee" from a crooked insurance broker for arranging Teamsters union business and temporarily lost his law license.

Before him, Attorney General John Mitchell went to prison for Watergate evils.

Attempts to block Meese's nomination haven't been helped by a discovery about his chief attacker. Sen. Howard Metzenbaum led the opposition in the first round of Senate hearings on Meese's confirmation. Now it turns out that Metzenbaum took a $250,000 finder fee for making a phone call to expedite sale of the Hay Adams Hotel in Washington. He eventually returned the money, but his standing as a moral accuser has been undercut.

Other senators, however, should continue the fight. This society doesn't need any more tainted attorneys general.

When Meese's name comes up for Senate confirmation, we urge West Virginia's new team, Sen Robert C. Byrd and Sen. J.D. Rockefeller IV, to cast their votes in keeping with a view expressed by retiring Sen. Jennings Randolph:

Meese may be fit for some federal jobs—but not for the sensitive post of top legal officer.

[From the Buffalo News, Jan. 8, 1985]

MEESE IS ILL SUITED FOR TOP JUSTICE POST

Although not surprising, it is nonetheless disappointing that President Reagan has again nominated Edwin Meese III, a longtime Reagan political adviser and now a presidential counselor, to become attorney general of the United States.

The president had originally selected Mr. Meese to succeed Attorney General William French Smith a year ago. Then questions arose about earlier financial dealings between Mr. Meese and several friends who later received appointments to federal jobs.

A lengthy investigation by an independent federal counsel cleared Mr. Meese of any wrongdoing and, in the wake of that, the president announced that he planned to renominate him. This he has now done. Sen. Robert Dole, the majority leader, wants to "move as quickly as possible" to confirm the appointment.

But this is a nomination the Senate should approach with care. There may be many responsible federal positions that Mr. Meese would be well suited to fill. But attorney general, the nation's chief law enforcement office and exemplar of sensitivity to the strictest ethical standards in government, is not one of them.

In his investigation, the special independent counsel found "no basis" for criminal prosecution of Mr. Meese but did not evaluate his fitness for the office of attorney general. That is a task for the Senate, and it should not be hurried. The report did not dispute the fact that on several occasions Mr. Meese supported for various federal posts persons who had granted him financial favors in the recent past. In one instance, he backed for a position on the Postal Board of Governors a man who had arranged a $40,000 loan for him. In another, a longtime friend who gave Mrs. Meese a $15,000 interest-free loan went to work soon afterward on Mr. Meese's White House staff.

Archibald Cox, chairman of Common Cause, pointed up the troubling aspects of those personal-public relationships in observing that "a bare minimum of public integrity requires the public official who has accepted financial favors to take no part in choosing his personal benefactors for government jobs or in otherwise doing business with them on behalf of the government."

In opposing Mr. Meese's nomination, Mr. Cox, a former solicitor general and former Watergate special prosecutor, asserted that no one can effectively serve the high standards of the top Justice Department position "who, even though not guilty of a crime, has left the appearance of repeatedly mixing government appointments with his private financial affairs."

There is another reason to question this nomination. In wrapping up the Watergate investigation in 1975, the special prosecutor's office recommended that future presidents should not nominate as attorney general, nor the Senate confirm, "a person who has served as the president's campaign manager or in a similar high-level campaign role." That projects a standard not always followed in past administrations. Even so, Mr. Meese was campaign director for the president in the 1980 national campaign, and it would be prudent to avoid even the appearance of mixing politics and leadership at the Justice Department.

For these reasons, the Senate would be justified in turning down Mr. Meese's nomination as attorney general.

[From the Charlotte Observer, Jan. 2, 1985]

IS MEESE FIT?—ETHICAL QUESTIONS REMAIN

Apparently Edwin Meese's nomination as U.S. Attorney General will sail through the Senate next month, now that a court-appointed independent counsel has found him unindictable for criminal misconduct.

In other words, Mr. Meese is not a crook. Never mind that he has shown almost no sensitivity for the questions of ethics, integrity and propriety that ought to concern the nation's top law enforcement officer. Apparently his loyalty to the president is sufficient qualification to get him into the attorney general's office.

Last year's confirmation hearings were aborted when questions arose about Mr. Meese's propensity for making rashly insensitive remarks about civil libertarians (among others) and for helping people get federal jobs after they helped bail him out of financial crises.

After a five-month probe of the favoritism charges, independent counsel Jacob Stein reported in September that he had found "no basis" for "the bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese for violation of a criminal statute." Mr. Stein took pains to point out, however, that he made "no comment on Mr. Meese's ethics and the propriety of his conduct or an evaluation of (his) fitness for office."

The president nevertheless hailed the report as a "gratifying" vindication of his old friend. N.C. Sen. John East, a judiciary committee member, said it reaffirmed his view of Mr. Meese as "a man of character and integrity." And Sen. Robert Dole, the new majority leader, pledged to move swiftly on the nomination. "I think we've held Ed Meese hostage long enough," Sen. Dole said.

The only fly in the ointment at this point is Archibald Cox, chairman of Common Cause and former Watergate special prosecutor. Mr. Cox has lately been pointing out that the Senate will be shirking its responsibility if it does not examine the ethical questions raised—but not resolved—by the Stein report.

". . . It is not enough for an attorney general to have a little ticket saying, 'we find no basis . . . for the bringing of a (criminal) prosecution.' Lack of evidence of violation of criminal statutes is one thing," said Mr. Cox. "Compliance with the ethical requirements of high office is quite another."

We concur with Mr. Cox and admire his perseverance. But we fear his eloquent defense of integrity will be drowned out by the pro-Meese chorus, led by a president whose standards for cabinet members have set a new low.

[From the Chicago (IL) Herald, Dec. 29, 1984]

NO MEESE

One of the early items of business for the Senate after the Congress convenes Jan. 2 is likely to be President Reagan's renomination of Edwin Meese to be U.S. attorney general, succeeding William French Smith, and it will be anything but a routine confirmation.

In September Meese was cleared by a special prosecutor of any criminal wrongdoing, and the president indicated he would still push for Meese as attorney general if he were re-elected.

Meese may not have broken any laws, but he is tainted by actions that clearly demonstrate his insensitivity to the code of ethics that should govern those who hold high office. He apparently recognized no conflict of interest when he took part in appointing to federal positions people who had done him financial favors, and he accepted a military promotion that gave the appearance of receiving preferential treatment even though he had been warned about it by the Secretary of the Army.

We said earlier we believe President Reagan can find a better qualified person to be U.S. attorney general, and we suspect many in the Senate feel the same way. Pushing for Meese's confirmation can only further alienate those Republican Senators who already differ with Reagan on the budget.

Too many important issues need to be tackled, like tax reform, the deficit and immigration reform for the Senate to waste time haggling over Meese. Reagan should look for someone else.

[From the Chicago Tribune, Dec. 29, 1984]

APPOINTING A CRONY-GENERAL

According to Archibald Cox, the former special prosecutor in the Watergate case, presidential counselor Edwin Meese has shown "utter insensitivity to ethical standards" and therefore should not be confirmed as U.S. attorney general. His reasons seem more complicated than they need be. Mr. Meese should not be attorney general simply because he is a bad choice for the job.

Mr. Cox made his comments at a press conference on findings by another special prosecutor—this one a court-appointed investigator who looked into charges that Mr. Meese had violated federal laws. The conclusion was that he had not. He was charged with nominating or supporting for federal jobs several persons with whome he'd had financial dealings; Jacob Stein, the independent counsel, did not dispute that, but found that these actions did not add up to criminal wrongdoing. Mr. Stein did not comment on the ethical questions involved on Mr. Meese's overall fitness for the post.

Ethics is just what concerned Mr. Cox and Common Cause, the public-interest group he now heads. And it has become the principal focus of attention in the Meese appointment.

But this is not the only argument against Mr. Meese, or even the main one. Let us pretend that Mr. Meese had never tried to wangle federal jobs for people who had done him financial favors—that he was a model of rectitude admired by all. That does not change the fact that he is unqualified for the post.

Mr. Meese has some background in law; he was deputy district attorney of California's Alameda County, and formerly directed the Center for Criminal Justice Policy and Management at the University of San Diego school of law. But this country abounds in better legal scholars and constitutional experts; Mr. Meese is primarily a businessman, and his role in the administration has been that of a planner and organizational troubleshooter. He was nominated for the sole reason that President Reagan likes him and seems unaware that any other qualification is needed.

If the appointment goes through, it will be an unabashed admission that the federal government is being run on the buddy system. To be the nation's top legal officer under this administration, one apparently needs only to be a booming, jovial fellow whose political views coincide with the President's. But that isn't nearly enough.

[From the Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer, Dec. 31, 1984]

ED MEESE, REDUX

Early in the new year White House counselor Edwin Meese III is expected to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee in his second effort to win confirmation as attorney general. He should not be confirmed.

Ethical questions regarding Meese's personal financial dealings, which caused the committee to suspend 1983's confirmation proceedings, remain. The fact that the five-month investigation by special prosecutor Jacob A. Stein could find no basis for prosecuting the president's lawyer for violating criminal law does not mean that Meese is fit to serve as the nation's chief law enforcement officer.

Nor did the Stein report attempt to address that issue. The special prosecutor specifically pointed out that he was making no comment on Meese's ethics or the propriety of his conduct.

He wasn't required to. Nor was there any need to. It was plainly improper for Meese to have helped people who lent him money get government jobs—before or after the exchange of funds. Since he did, ignoring the ethical considerations involved with such behavior, there is no putting aside the concern that as attorney general, Meese might be less than effective as a watchman responsible for pursuing the impropriety of others.

There is further discomfort in Meese's engineering for himself a promotion to the rank of colonel in the Army reserve when he lacked the formal training requirements—which were waived in lieu of something called "constructive educational credit." Presumably he was awarded such credit for his White House work experience with the commander-in-chief. In any event, the man who assigned the credit—the chief of the Army reserve, was recommended for a second term. By the new reserve colonel and counselor to the president, Edwin Meese III.

If the attorney general of the United States should be a person whose credentials should be above reproach—and that is what the job demands—then Meese is the wrong individual for the post. His casualness with ethical standards places a disagreeable scent in the public nostril. He does not deserve Senate confirmation.

[From the Cocoa, Florida Today, Dec. 22, 1984]

MEESE OPPOSITION GROWS

A highly respected former high official in both Democratic and Republican administrations has joined the ranks of those trying to persuade President Ronald Reagan to back away from his effort to name presidential pal Edwin Meese III attorney general of the United States.

So many people objected to the Meese appointment earlier this year that stormy hearings in the Senate Judiciary Committee were suspended to await a special report by independent counsel Jacob Stein.

The Stein report found no basis for prosecuting Meese for the violation of a federal criminal statute, but citizens lobby Common Cause says the evidence, "far from vindicating Mr. Meese, clearly shows that he repeatedly acted in violation of the ethical standards that should have governed his conduct."

This evidence, says Common Cause chairman Archibald Cox, shows that Meese "is therefore unfit to be attorney general."

Cox has impressive credentials as the former Watergate special prosecutor in the 1973 impeachment proceedings against Richard Nixon who ordered Cox fired in the famous purge of Oct. 20, 1973. Cox had been solicitor general before that in the Kennedy and Johnson administrations.

Common Cause leaders have promised a major campaign in an effort to block the Meese confirmation, but the president has shown no signs of weakening, says he plans to resubmit Meese's name to the Judiciary Committee early next year.

As we have stated here previously, we sincerely hope that members of that committee will not yield to pressure from the president on behalf of his long-time crony.

The Common Cause conclusion that Meese violated a 1965 executive order which prohibits actions which adversely affect the public's confidence in government is too serious a charge to be overlooked.

We cannot believe that there are not men or women available for this appointment who meet the "cleaner than a hound's tooth" requirements that should prevail for the chief legal officer of this nation.

QUIET MEESE REVIVING

No prominent political figure has had a lower profile in Washington, D.C., in the past six months than President Reagan's close friend and counselor, Edwin Meese III. But he will resurface soon.

Mr. Meese was chosen last winter by the President to be U.S. attorney general replacing William French Smith, who wants out. But the appointment, which must be approved by the U.S. Senate, snagged on severe criticism about alleged deals in which

Mr. Meese's friends got government jobs after lending him money.

Mr. Meese asked for and got an investigation of 11 allegations against him by a special prosecutor, who reported last September there was "no basis . . . for bringing of a prosecution . . . for violation of a criminal statute." But the special prosecutor had "no comment on Mr. Meese's ethics and the propriety of his conduct or an evaluation of Mr. Meese's fitness for office."

Senate hearings on the appointment, suspended last March, will resume soon after Congress convenes. Mr. Meese will be opposed by the so-called people's lobby, Common Cause, and a coalition of other groups on grounds that he is not fit to serve as attorney general.

President Reagan intends to stand by his old friend, and Washington insiders say the Senate is likely to approve the appointment. The Senate only rarely turns down a President's choice of a Cabinet member.

Here is another situation where the public figure is blameless of criminal conduct, but there is dark suspicion about his ethical behavior. There are many distinguished and capable lawyers who would splendidly fit the office of attorney general, and we wish the President would choose one of them. Mr. Meese is not the best man for the job.

[From the Concord Monitor, Jan. 15, 1985]

REJECT MEESE

After reports last March that presidential counselor Ed Meese had failed to report loans from friends who subsequently got high-paying jobs in the Reagan administration, The Wall Street Journal grabbed the issue by the throat. It denounced the Watergate-era financial disclosure laws that had tripped Meese up, arguing that they created an impossible situation for candidates and public officals.

In one editorial, the Journal lamented that because of the requirements for honest financial accounting by government officials, "we shall see no more (Henry) Clays or (Sam) Rayburns in this town." In an even more remarkable editorial, the paper proclaimed, "We are going to have to kill ethics before ethics kills us." The paper suggested that because some of the people who had criticized Meese were themselves less pure than fresh snow, it made little sense to be too picky about Meese's reporting-failures and his various memory lapses.

Since the Journal made those observations, the tide has turned in Ed Meese's favor in his bid to become attorney general. A special prosecutor appointed to examine the charges against Meese concluded last fall that he found no grounds for bringing indictments. President Reagan said he was gratified that "the honor of a just man is vindicated." Except for Sen. Howard Metzenbaum and the citizens' lobby Common Cause, public opposition to Meese has muted. He is believed a shoo-in for confirmation.

Yet, as Finley Peter Dunne's Mr. Dooley was fond of saying, "not so fast." Nothing in special prosecutor Jacob Stein's 385-page report suggested that Meese was the victim of a media vendetta or that he had acted responsibly. Nothing in it contradicted the charges that Meese had failed to report, as the law required, an interest-free $15,000 loan from a friend to Meese's wife. Nothing in the report contradicted a Washington Post story that Meese was the beneficiary of $60,000 in loans arranged by his tax accountant, shortly before President Reagan named the accountant to a seat on the U.S. Postal Service board of governors. (Meese began repaying that loan only after the Post story ran in July 1983.)

On these matters, the Stein report simply determined that Meese had committed no indictable offense—largely, it would appear, because Stein felt be couldn't prove that the people who had helped Meese financially had gotten jobs as a quid-proquo for their help.

Stein's report, which was reasonable enough on legal grounds, is hardly the vindication President Reagan pronounced it. Being innocent of an indictable offense is surely necessary, but it is not sufficient grounds to be appointed to the nation's top law enforcement job.

We have some substantive problems with Mr. Meese as a potential attorney: his view of the American Civil Liberties Union as a "criminals lobby," for one thing, and his support for the ill-conceived National Security Decision Directive 84, which would impose lifetime censorship on more than 100,000 government employees, for another. But these matters trouble us less than Meese's ethics, which demonstrate a gross insensibility to the standards that an attorney general ought to uphold and exemplify.

Meese's incredible memory lapses on loans (would you forget a $15,000 loan from a friend to your wife—especially if that friend were angling for a job you could help him get?), combined with verifiable misstatements about the circumstances surrounding the sale of his California home and other apparent legal evasions examined in the Stein report, suggest that he is not the best person, by a long shot, whom the president could appoint to a most sensitive job.

The Wall Street Journal notwithstanding, we believe ethics do matter. We hope the Senate will refuse to confirm Meese's appointment.

[From the Davenport, IA, Quad City Times, Dec. 21, 1984]

WE SAY . . . FORGET ABOUT MEESE

If press forecasts are accurate, Ronald Reagan shortly after his inauguration will renominate presidential counselor Edwin Meese III to replace William French Smith as attorney general and the Senate will confirm the appointment with little opposition. That's nothing to look forward to.

Just because some special prosecutor found "no basis" for indicting Meese for some questionable actions—like helping to get government jobs for several people who did him financial favors—that does not mean he is fit to lead the Justice Department and become the nation's top law officer. This leadership post should not be manned by anyone whose ethics are under such serious question.

Reagan could do the country—and probably himself—a big favor by looking among nearly a quarter-billion people for an attorney general who would command more respect, trust and confidence. Archibald Cox, former Watergate prosecutor and chairman of Common Cause, reports that Meese is "blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official." The Senate would be blind, too, to confirm his appointment—as blind as when warning whistles were ignored to put Ray Donovan at Labor.

Common Cause points to "uncontradicted evidence" that Meese had a hand in getting high government jobs for people who did him financial favors. And it pointed out that Executive Order 11222 prohibits conducts that "might result in, or create, the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person . . . losing complete independence or impartiality of action."

Relative to this is Meese's appointment to colonel in the Army Reserve. Though he fell short in educational requirements, he was given something called "constructive educational credit" to gain the promotion. Meese then interceded with a successful recommendation to get an unusual second term for the chief of army reserves. That just happened to be the fellow who got him the credits.

When the "sleaze factor" was brought up during the recent election, Meese's name wasn't far behind. America should shoot for the highest moral standards at Justice. But Meese, who deals for personal advantage through use of government influence and leverage, undermines such a quest.

Meese simply isn't attorney general material. That's plain enough to Americans. It should be plain enough to Reagan and, if not, then to a Senate that should demand a higher standard.

[From the Des Moines Register, Dec. 26, 1984]

AT LEAST HE'S NO CRIMINAL

Archibald Cox is right about Edwin Meese: The Senate should vote "no" if, as expected, President Reagan renominates Meese for attorney general. The fact that an independent counsel cleared Meese of any crime in connection with accepting favors from people who later received federal appointments does not mean he is fit to be the nation's highest-ranking law officer.

Cox, the chairman of Common Cause, learned a lot about ethics—or lack of ethics—in government when he was Watergate special prosecutor. He said last week that the report of independent counsel Jacob Stein showed Meese to be "blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a high public official." We expressed a similar view when Meese was first proposed for the attorney generalship some months ago.

The Stein report showed that Meese, as counsel to the president, "repeatedly participated in appointing . . . persons who had either done or were doing him financial favors," said Cox. Apart from his ethical failings, Meese is a mediocrity with few visible qualifications for the job except his friendship with the president.

Unfortunately, the Senate seems not to have the stomach for a nomination fight, so the nation is likely to get an attorney general who, for all his shortcomings—well, who at least is not a criminal. We can be thankful for that small favor.

[From the Durham (NC) Herald, Jan. 12, 1985]

EDWIN MEESE III NOT BEST ATTORNEY GENERAL NOMINEE

Executive Order 11222 requires federal employees to maintain "the highest standards of honesty, integrity, impartiality and conduct" and to avoid "misconduct and conflicts of interest . . . through informed judgment."

Edwin Meese III, President Reagan's nominee for attorney general, is not a crook. But based on this executive order he is not a good choice to become the nation's top-ranking law enforcement officer.

Mr. Meese is one of Mr. Reagan's closest friends. He underwent a tough examination by an independent counsel, Jacob Stein, a prominent Washington attorney. Mr. Stein said in a 400-page report that there were no reasons to bring criminal charges against Mr. Meese.

So Mr. Meese was clearly exonerated from criminal liability of the allegations that he had used his position and accepted money to grant political favors.

He did not, however, come squeaky clean—at least not when one considers Executive Order 11222.

At best, he showed lack of good judgment when he accepted a $40,000 loan from San Francisco accountant John McKean, whom Meese approved for an unexpired term on the Postal Board of Governors. (Mr. McKean later arranged another loan for Mr. Meese and deferred interest payments on the $40,000).

The same can be said of Mr. Meese's approval of Los Angeles lawyer and real estate developer Thomas Barrack for two high-level government jobs. That came after Mr. Barrack arranged the sale of Mr. Meese's house, which had been on the market for 18 months, causing him serious financial hardship. Interestingly, the down payment on Mr. Meese's house was made by Ted Elkin, Mr. Barrack's friend and employee, using more than $83,000 of Mr. Barrack's money via a loan that Mr. Barrack later forgave.

Questions have also been raised about Mr. Meese's promotion in 1983 from lieutenant colonel to colonel in the Army Reserve. The Army concluded, after an internal investigation, that the promotion was made "not on the basis of past military performance but rather on the basis of national prominence." While that's no terrible sin, it is worrisome that Mr. Meese later endorsed the reappointment of Army Reserve chief Gen. William Berkman, one of three Army officers who signed a section related to Mr. Meese's promotion.

The Stein investigation revealed other possible conflicts. While saying Mr. Meese was guilty of no criminal offense, Mr. Stein's report did leave distinct impressions: Mr. Meese was a man who was careless about his financial dealings, who could be justifiably criticized for cronyism, who might be considered sloppy in his legal interpretations on matters which affected him.

The job demands more courage and propriety that Mr. Meese has shown. The Stein report said nothing specifically about Mr. Meese's qualifications to serve as attorney general. That was not Mr. Stein's job. But the report clearly shows Mr. Meese lacks the judgment and mettle the job demands.

[From the Gilroy, CA, Dispatch, Jan. 2, 1985]

MEESE UNFIT FOR APPOINTMENT

In June and December of 1981, an accountant named John R. McKean arranged unsecured loans totalling $60,000 for presidential counselor Ed Meese. In October 1981, Meese supported McKean's nomination to an unexpired term on the U.S. Postal Board of Governors, and in January 1983, with interest on the loans still overdue, Meese supported McKean's nomination to a full term on that board.

In August 1982, attorney and real estate developer Thomas J. Barrack, Jr., assisted Meese and his wife Ursula in the sale of their California home, a complicated deal that included a personal loan of $70,000 Barrack made to the buyer of the house and that Barrack later forgave. A week after the deal was closed, a meeting was arranged between Barrack and members of the White House Personnel Office, including Meese, and three months after that Barrack began work as deputy secretary of the interior, a post for which Barrack had Meese's approval. It appears that at no point in that process did Meese disclose that he was a personal beneficiary of Barrack's considerable financial assistance.

In a period lasting through 1982, Meese received a series of loans from the Great American First Savings Bank that eventually totalled $402,000. Meese was substantially in arrears on several of those loans and failed to answer a number of requests from the bank to sign a modification agreement extending the loan. In the same period, Meese helped arrange senior administration posts for four officers and former officers of the bank, among them Gordon Luce, the bank's chairman and chief executive officer (member of the President's Commission on Housing and, later, alternate delegate to the United Nations General Assembly); Marc Sandstrom, bank vice president and general counsel (board member of the federal Legal Services Corporation); and Clarence Pendelton, a member of the bank's board of directors (chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights).

On Jan. 7, 1981, Edwin W. Thomas, a friend of the Meeses, lent Ursula Meese $15,000 to purchase stock. Virtually at the same time, Thomas became Meese's White House assistant and, later, administrator of the San Francisco office of the General Services Administration. Subsequently, Thomas' wife and Thomas' son also obtained federal jobs. Meese failed to report the loan, even though he filed a required federal financial disclosure report less than two months after she received it.

In each of these instances, and in several others, among them Meese's frequent failures to recall significant documents, conversations and transactions, a special prosecutor found no evidence to sustain criminal charges. But the special prosecutor avoided as beyond his mandate any comment on Meese's ethical or moral fitness to be attorney general of the United States.

Ronald Reagan wants Ed Meese to be attorney general and, had it not been for those charges of impropriety, Meese would probably have been confirmed last spring. Now with the special prosecutor's report in hand, and with the election over, Reagan will resubmit Meese's name to a Republican-dominated Senate that's expected to confirm him. Meese, says the president, has been "vindicated." But the report does nothing to dispel the charges—indeed it confirms their accuracy—other than to say Ed Meese is not an indictable crook.

A cynic may point out that, if confirmed, Meese would be just another in a long line of political hacks and presidential cronies who, at one time or another, have served as attorney general. But while that may speak to his lack of experience, if not his lack of competence, it does nothing to raise his ethical stature. And in this area he may well be uniquely unqualified.

The attorney general is the nation's chief law enforcement officer and as such—to quote former Watergate Special Prosecutor Archibald Cox—the office requires a person who can "symbolize the highest standards of honor, integrity and freedom from favoritism or other self-interest." With a record like his, how could Meese direct an investigation into charges (for example) into high-level favoritism by others in government, or assure anyone else, in or outside government, that if such allegations came to his attention he would even begin to understand them? To quote Cox again: "Meese may have intended no wrong. His past conduct shows, however, that he is blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official." The fact that he is not subject to criminal prosecution himself does not save his stunted ethical sense from serious doubt and it surely does not qualify him to be the attorney general of the United States.

[From the Hartford Courant, Jan. 13, 1985]

EDWIN MEESE, AGAIN

Soon after President Reagan's inauguration for a second term, the Senate will again take up the nomination of Edwin Meese III for attorney general. At that point, a rigorous test of the Senate's good judgment will begin.

Confirmation hearings were postponed last year by a special prosecutor's investigation of 11 allegations against the nominee. Mr. Meese's advocates, including the president, imply that the report of the five-month inquiry eliminated all questions about his fitness to head the Justice Department.

That however, is not the case. In fact, the reverse is true: The report made it impossible to argue credibly that Mr. Meese is a wise choice for attorney general.

The investigation by special prosecutor Jacob A. Stein dealt with just one subject: whether there was enough evidence of criminal wrongdoing by Mr. Meese to warrant prosecution. He concluded that there wasn't.

Mr. Stein wasn't told to review other possibly illegal behavior by the nominee, such as violations of civil laws or federal regulations. Nor was he directed to evaluate Mr. Meese's ethical sensitivity or other character traits bearing on his fitness to be attorney general.

The special prosecutor said only that Mr. Meese shouldn't be prosecuted for the behavior in question. The Senate must avoid getting caught up in the attempt by the White House to use the report to sweep the remaining questions under the rug and Mr. Meese into office.

Senators with open minds and high ethical standards who can lay aside party loyalty will find it extremely difficult not to conclude that, while Mr. Meese may be innocent of criminal conduct, he is an unacceptable candidate for a position of such special public trust.

Few senators may find time to read the lengthy Stein report. Fortunately, there's an excellent 37-page review of the report prepared and recently released by Common Cause, the non-partisan citizens' lobby.

Common Cause, which opposes Mr. Meese's nomination, discussed in detail six of the 11 allegations investigated by the independent counsel. They involve these matters:

Two nominations of accountant John R. McKean to the U.S. Postal Board of Governors, and two loans from Mr. McKean to Mr. Meese, who was on a White House committee that recommended Mr. McKean for the board.

High federal jobs given to Thomas J. Barrack Jr., an attorney and real estate developer who helped Mr. and Mrs. Meese sell their home in California when they were in deep financial trouble.

Mr. Meese's irregular promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve (allowing him a higher pension) and his equally irregular change from retired to active status, together with the nomination—after Mr. Meese's urging—of the chief of the Army Reserve to a second term.

Three loans to the Meeses—and a generous tolerance of their failure to repay them on time—by a bank, four of whose current or former officials were given presidential appointments.

A loan from a friend of the Meeses, Edwin W. Thomas, to Mrs. Meese, and the federal jobs obtained for Mr. Thomas, his wife and son. Also, Mr. Meese's failure to list the loan in his disclosure statements.

Mr. Meese's acceptance, as reimbursement for "moving expenses," of money left in a 1980 presidential transition fund despite the possibility that the reimbursement was illegal. Also, Mr. Meese's later having the records changed to show that his check was for "consulting fees."

Perhaps in none of these cases was Mr. Meese intentionally involved in anything wrong. The extent of his personal involvement isn't clear, thanks largely to his memory lapses. But time after time he should have known that what was occurring would raise strong suspicions that he was using public office for private gain. As a federal employee, he was subject to rules prohibiting acts that could create even the appearance of such impropriety.

There are many ethically sensitive, distinguished and broadly experienced attorneys whom the president could have asked to serve. Instead, he picked Mr. Meese.

By tradition, presidents are given a relatively free hand in making executive branch appointments. But when the job is as important as that of attorney general, and when the president uses such poor judgment in choosing, an exception to the rule is in order.

[From the High Point (NC) Enterprise Dec. 27, 1984]

POWERFUL FOE FOR MEESE

Soon after the first of the year the new U.S. Senate will have to deal with the matter of Edwin Meese. Meese is the nominee of President Reagan to be attorney general of the United States. An independent counsel selected by the administration has concluded that there is no basis for indicting Meese on criminal charges which surfaced earlier this year and raised questions about his suitability to take such an important post.

Rises now Common Cause, the self-designated citizens' lobby, to say that it will actively oppose the Meese confirmation. A fact not to be overlooked is that Archibald Cox, who ten years ago headed the independent prosecution of Richard Nixon for the sins of Watergate, is now chairman of Common Cause.

In a recently issued statement, Cox minced no words in declaring his belief that Meese is unfit for the appointment, because of his various financial dealings with individuals which were followed by appointments to comfortable federal jobs as well as for his apparent wheeler-dealing to fatten his own future military pension probabilities.

Cox makes much of the language in the independent prosecutor's report. That report did say that nothing was found to form the basis for the bringing of a prosecution. It did not refute the charges of moral turpitude and it did not make an evaluation of Meese's fitness for public office.

Cox insists that the "uncontradicted evidence . . . shows that Mr. Meese repeatedly participated in appointing to high government positions individuals who had done or were doing him financial favors or who were affiliated with an organization that had done him financial favors." In various cases, he added, "Meese violated Executive Order 11222, which proscribes conduct: ". . . which might result in, or create the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or persons . . ."

And Cox concludes, "Mr. Meese may have intended no wrong. His past conduct shows, however, that he is blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official."

These are sentiments which we voiced several months ago. The U.S. Senate will strike a blow for higher ethical conduct if it will reject Edwin Meese for the job of attorney general.

[From the Huntington (WV) Herald-Dispatch, Dec. 24, 1984]

MEESE INSENSITIVITY

Serious questions about Edwin Meese's finances put his nomination as attorney general on hold earlier this year. But in September an independent prosecutor said he found no basis for a criminal prosecution of Meese.

Describing that as "vindication" of one of his top aides, President Reagan has said he will re-submit Meese's nomination to the Senate when it convenes next month. And Sen. Robert Dole, the Senate's new majority leader, has predicted that "unless there is some new disclosure,' Meese's nomination will be approved by the Republican-controlled Senate with little or no delay.

A new report prepared by Common Cause, the liberal lobbying group, offers no new information. Nonetheless, the report raises the important issue of what it calls Meese's "insensitivity to ethical standards."

Common Cause researchers, who studied the independent prosecutor's report, concluded that Meese more than once ignored a 1965 executive order prohibiting conduct that "might result in, or create the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person . . . losing complete independence or impartiality of action."

For example, there's the $40,000 loan that accountant John McKean arranged for Meese who, in turn, later supported McKean's nomination to the Postal Service's Board of Governors. Still later, after McKean helped with another loan, Meese backed McKean for a full term on the board, which he now serves as chairman.

As Archibald Cox, the former Watergate prosecutor who is chairman of Common Cause, observes: "A bare minimum of public integrity requires the public official who has accepted personal financial favors to take no part in choosing his personal benefactors for government jobs."

That seems obvious to everybody but Ed Meese—and the President who is determined to appoint him attorney general.

[From the Hyannis (MA) Cape Cod Times, Dec. 30, 1984]

CATCH 11222: THE MEESE AFFAIR

At the moment, the appointment of presidential counselor, Edwin Meese III to the post of U.S. attorney general seems safe. For one thing, President Reagan is determined that his man will get the position. For another, an independent investigation has found "no basis" for Meese's prosecution for ethics violations. Rather like William Casey having been found "not unfit to serve" as CIA director.

Whether or not there is basis for prosecuting Meese on the charges the independent counsel investigated is largely beside the point—if that finding isn't questionable in itself. What Reagan loyalist Meese (Gov. Reagan's chief of staff from 1970 to 1974) lacks is the aura of integrity.

And, some recent attorneys general aside, integrity is a necessary qualification for a position that demands the absolute impartiality of the nation's number-one lawyer. Only such a person can build confidence in the even-handedness of law enforcement that is essential to democracy.

What are Meese's faults? Several. The independent counsel's report shows without question that, as counsel to the president, Meese repeatedly participated in the appointment of friends and financial supporters to important government positions. For example:

John McKean, named at Meese's urging to the U.S. Postal Service' Board of Governors, had earlier arranged a $40,000, low-interest loan for Meese, and later agreed to defer $12,000 in interest payments owed by Meese.

Edwin Thomas, who was named to the position of assistant counsel to the president early this year, granted a $15,000 unsecured, interest-free loan to Meese, who is now his boss. Furthermore, Meese failed to report the loan on his financial disclosure statement.

Thomas Barrack, who arranged the sale of Meese's California house, was recommended for the position of assistant secretary of commerce. Meese, whose name was included among those proposing Barrack for the job, told no one of his connection with the man.

"In each of these instances," reports Common Cause, "Mr. Meese violated Executive Order 11222, which proscribes conduct . . . 'which might result in, or give the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person. . . .'" Common Cause will lead the attack on the Meese nomination when it comes before the Senate next month.

The Meese affair concerns more than the fitness of the man himself. If he is appointed, the message will be implicit to others in federal government that with a certain amount of care, they are free to use their offices for personal gain.

"Toleration of the appearance of linking personal financial advantages with government appointments," said Common Cause chairman Archibald Cox, "is the beginning of a long downhill slide into major corruptions." Cox, who was Watergate special prosecutor, knows what he's talking about.

Earlier this year, a senior Justice Department official made this comment about the Meese nomination: "This is the danger when a president appoints a political crony. You can be sure that if the nominee had been someone not close to the president his background would have been thoroughly checked.

"There are a number of distinguished lawyers in this department," he said, "who believe the attorney general should himself be a distinguished lawyer. We feel the president could do better."

The Meese affair, with its implied violations of Executive Order 11222, continues. So do the dangers of cronyism. The battle is now largely Common Cause versus the White House. It is a contest that should be fought, because Meese certainly is not the man who would bring the mantle of honor and integrity to that important national office.

[From the Kalamazoo (MI) Gazette, Jan. 3, 1985]

A YEAR HASN'T ERASED EDWIN MEESE'S FLAWS

Nearly a year has passed since President Reagan nominated Edwin Meese to succeed William French Smith as attorney general. He was not a good candidate for the job then, and he isn't now. Meese's primary qualification, as far as we can see, is his strong and long personal relationhip with the president, which may serve him well in his role as presidential counselor, but is inadequate for the nation's top law-enforcement officer.

The case against Meese is just as strong now as it was last year when independent counsel Jacob A. Stein investigated his tangled financial affairs. While Stein found nothing to warrant prosecution, he also was silent on Meese's ethical standards, saying there was nothing in his instructions about addressing those issues.

That silence, however, was not golden. The Senate Judiciary Committee, expected to hold confirmation hearings later this month, should give close attention to Stein's demurral that he would leave it to others to determine Meese's fitness to serve as head of the Department of Justice.

The committee should also consider what an independent counsel of an earlier era, Archibald Cox, had to say about Meese's fitness to serve. Cox, now chairman of Common Cause, knows a thing or two about ethical conduct; he was the first Watergate special prosecutor, the one President Nixon ordered fired.

In a press conference recently, Cox said Meese's conduct—finding government jobs for people who helped him out of financial difficulties and finagaling a promotion in the Army reserve—was evidence "that he is blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official."

Cronyism is practiced to some degree by most administrations, usually to their dismay. President Reagan would do well to forgo renominating Meese as attorney general—but he won't. The Senate would do well to deny confirmation—but it probably won't. Only eight nominees for Cabinet positions have been rejected in the Senate in the history of the nation.

A ninth would be in order. But that is probably too much to ask.

[From the Kansas City Times, Jan. 4, 1985]

NOT MR. MEESE

Presumably the landslide re-election of President Reagan assures the appointment of Edwin Meese III, a long-time Reagan political ally and currently presidential counselor, as attorney general. Yet the thought remains: His clearance of criminal wrongdoing by an independent counsel does not necessarily mean Mr. Meese is qualified to be the chief law enforcement officer of the land.

In fact, if adherence to ethics rules and setting the proper tone and example for this sensitive office are considered, Ed Meese should not be U.S. attorney general.

While the extensive investigation of Mr. Meese did not turn up an indictable offense, the independent counsel's report notes conduct outside the rules that apply to federal officials. Both a presidential order and federal regulations prohibit use of official position for private advantage or even the appearance of such conduct.

Among other acts, the report shows that contrary to rules Mr. Meese did not include in his financial disclosure statement an interest-free $15,000 loan to his wife from a friend who a short time thereafter was hired to work under Mr. Meese in the White House. Mr. Meese also participated in decisions to appoint people to government jobs who had helped him during a time of financial distress.

The attorney general should be sensitive, not only to violations of the letter of the law but to upholding the spirit of the law. By his actions, Mr. Meese has demonstrated either an inadequate knowledge of the rules, a poor memory of written correspondence and conversations about his outside financial dealings, or refusal to abide by well-known standards of conduct. In any case, Mr. Meese lacks the credibility to serve as attorney general.

ED MEESE RETURNS

The wrong kind of resignation will soon bring the saga of Edwin Meese 3rd to a sorry end. No, Meese won't do the country a favor and leave the Reagan administration. Instead, the U.S. Senate will resign itself to Meese's ethical shortcomings and approve his appointment as attorney general of the United States.

How quickly America forgives and forgets.

When President Reagan nominated Meese a year ago to be attorney general, liberals were immediately outraged. As one of Reagan's top advisers, Meese had made a name for himself as a callous hard-liner. The nomination came only a few weeks after Meese had offended most sensibilities by saying that the recession-struck people in charity soup kitchens were only there to cash in on free food.

Even conservatives started to worry about putting Meese in charge of the Justice Department, however, once the Senate began its confirmation hearings. Each day brought forth a new story about a friend who had loaned Meese money and then received a government job. By March, Republican senators were beginning to squirm: If they supported Meese, voters would question their ethical standards, and if they opposed him, they would be denouncing their own president's ethics.

Just when the controversy was reaching its peak, the public investigation went private, thanks to the appointment of a special prosecutor to see if Meese had broken any laws. The investigation took five months, during which Meese kept an extremely low profile. The prosecutor concluded that there wasn't enough evidence to indict Meese on any charges. That, of course, is not the same as clearing him of any wrongdoing. The country has to presume Meese's innocence, but it should note that the report said others would have to decide if Meese's conduct had been ethical.

That might have been a worthwhile campaign issue, but Walter Mondale never got voters interested in the "sleaze factor." Rather than push the Senate to approve Meese's nomination before the election, the president kept Meese out of the spotlight for the duration of the campaign.

So now he's back, waiting for confirmation. Reagan has had his big win—despite the sleaze factor—and senators can be forgiven for concluding that voters don't care about ethical standards in the Cabinet. Those few senators willing to take on the administration will probably focus on the budget—an issue where their efforts may still make a difference. Even Meese's opponents are probably resigned to his victory.

It remains true that Meese is unfit for the job. His vision of justice does not extend to the poor, as shown by his repeated attempts to dismantle the Legal Services Corporation. His faith in civil liberties is meager, as shown by his support of strong-arm tactics to detect government leaks and censor government employees. His work as director of Reagan's 1980 campaign will make it difficult for Meese to bring sufficient political independence to the Justice Department.

The Senate won't care, though, because Meese has beat the system. He has kept quiet and let the passage of time make him dull, forgetable, noncontroversial. Unfortunately, the Justice Department needs a leader who is more than unindictable.

[From the Lincoln (NE) Evening Journal, Jan. 9, 1985]

PALACE GUARDSMANSHIP

The job swap by Treasury Secretary Donald Regan and White House chief of staff James Baker III displays an unsuspected creativity at the very top of the Reagan administration.

Baker's departure would end all linkages with the Reagan first-term troika system of highest echelon management. Or it will if the Senate confirms presidential counseler Edwin Meese III as attorney general. (More on that later.) Baker, Meese and Michael Deaver—outwardbound for the green paradise of public relations—were the Big Three.

Henceforth, Donald Regan, a blunt CEO type who loyally espoused the company line at the Treasury for four years, will be the singular top dog at the White House. That is almost always a better staff arrangement than one which is structurally divided and thus can internally find itself at odds.

Whether this switch will result in any significant policy alterations should be doubted. The Boss still signs off on position papers presented for his approval.

A pleasant surprise was how the episode of musical chairs—satisfying personal ambitions of both Baker and Regan—was received by the loyal opposition.

So uncharacteristically gracious was the reaction of Speaker of the House Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. that his comment bears repeating: "Jim Baker and Donald Regan are very able and talented public servants who always do a job well. I am looking forward to working just as constructively with them in their new positions as I have in their previous assignments. The country has been well served by their past efforts and I expect that the country will be just as well served by their efforts in their new jobs." Wow!

With that from Speaker O'Neill, one might have guessed that the Republican New Right would then be sour and grumpy. Sure enough, parts of it—the part which has tended to view Baker as a kind of closet moderate—were.

Let's hope this unusual shift of Palace Guardsmen does not depend upon what happens to Meese, for Meese should not be confirmed. Not if the head of the Department of Justice is to be a universal symbol of the highest standards of ethical behavior, an officer who does not bring in with in a cloud that darkens the public trust which is his.

Last year the independent counsel who ran a detailed look at Meese's financial dealings concluded there was "no basis . . . for the bringing of a (criminal) prosecution." But, as Common Cause Chairman Archibald Cox said last month, "the uncontradicted evidence in the report shows Mr. Meese repeatedly participated in appointing to high government positions individuals who had done or were doing him financial favors, or who were affiliated with an organizations that had done him financial favors."

There are many, many conservative Republican lawyers whose ethical conduct has never been called into question. They are men and women whose fitness for the office of attorney general could not be challenged—as Edwin Meese's qualifications have been.

President Reagan would do honor to his own reputation by withdrawing Meese's name and offering another.

[From Newsday, Dec. 21, 1984]

MEESE IS UNFIT TO BE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Archibald Cox and Common Cause, the nonpartisan citizens' lobby he heads, are doing the nation a favor by continuing to address the issue of Edwin Meese's fitness to serve as attorney general.

In a letter sent this week to all Senators, Cox said a special prosecutor's report showed that Meese was "blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official." Cox understands those requisites; he was the first Watergate prosecutor and was fired for being too effective.

Last spring, the Senate postponed action on Meese's nomination to succeed William French Smith after a number of charges surfaced. They were subsequently investigated by a special prosecutor, Jacob Stein, who concluded that there was not enough evidence to support a prosecution for violations of federal criminal law. President Ronald Reagan has said he intends to renominate his counselor and old friend early next year.

Yet Meese and his family were repeatedly the objects of extraordinary financial largesse from friends and acquaintances, several of whom later landed federal jobs. There were also allegations of filing false financial disclosure statements, illegally accepting gifts and insider stock trading.

In response to the special prosecutor's queries, Meese often said he couldn't remember events or actions. As Cox noted, Stein's report "reflects a man who is not merely occasionally forgetful, but rather, if taken at his word, suffers from frequent lapses of memory concerning conversations, documents and events bearing upon the integrity of his conduct."

Last fall, Meese and Reagan hailed Stein's report as proof of Meese's total exoneration. But it's considerably less than that. Stein refused to comment on the appropriateness or ethics of Meese's actions or his fitness for office. But he noted rather pointedly, "There is sufficient interest in those other issues to support an expectation that they will not remain unexplored . . ." Common Cause now seeks to insure that they won't.

Not being indictable is surely an insufficient qualification for the nation's top law enforcement job. As we have said before, Reagan would be wise to look for another nominee. Better yet, Meese should withdraw of his own accord.

[From the Los Angeles Times, Dec. 31, 1984]

MEESE: THE WRONG MAN

Last February President Reagan nominated his longtime associate and counselor, Edwin Meese III, as attorney general. Late next month the Senate Judiciary Committee is expected to hold confirmation hearings on that nomination. This will be the second time around for Meese and the committee, the first hearings having been suspended earlier this year so that an independent counsel could investigate allegations of criminal wrongdoing by the nominee.

The counsel, Jacob A. Stein, a respected Washington lawyer, concluded last September that there was no evidence to support criminal prosecution of Meese on any of the 11 charges raised against him. But Stein said that he would leave it to others to determine whether Meese had adhered to the standards of ethics and propriety that his White House position required and that his potential role at the head of the Justice Department demands.

The ethical questions regarding Meese for the most part involve money and patronage. In half a dozen cases Meese arranged federal jobs for people who had either directly or, through the institutions that they served, indirectly helped the Meese family financially. These favors included cash loans—among them an interest-free loan of $15,000 to Meese's wife that he failed to disclose, as the law requires.

An additional favor to Meese came from the Army, which at his request approved a highly irregular transfer from the retired to the ready reserve. That move opened the way for Meese to enjoy more exalted rank and the benefits that accompany it. The Army later acknowledged the impropriety of the transfer, and Meese withdrew to the retired reserve. But he retained the promotion and benefits that he received as a result of the unwarranted move.

There may indeed be nothing illegal about a government official conferring public rewards on those who have done him private favors, but, unproscribed or not, such actions are ethically indefensible. They are particularly so for a person who seeks to become the nation's chief law-enforcement officer. The Senate, in the view of many of its leaders, has no taste for continuing the fight over the Meese nomination, and his confirmation as attorney general for now seems assured. But Senate approval will neither answer nor eradicate the questions that have been raised about proper behavior. An ethical blind spot is a major infirmity in an attorney general. In our view it is a disqualifying one.

[From the Lousiville (KY) Times, Jan. 7, 1985

NEW CAST TO PLAY IN REAGAN SHOW

As President Reagan prepares to begin his second term, there are major changes in his supporting cast. Here's a look at three of them.

President Reagan has resubmitted the name of his counselor, Edwin Meese, to the Senate for confirmation as attorney general. However, the reasons for rejecting the longtime presidential chum are, if anything, clearer than they were last year when the nomination was tabled.

Unfortunately, there may not be much opposition to the nomination. Pressure from the Oval Office to ignore Mr. Meese's regrettable ethical lapses and install him at the Justice Department is said to be intense.

And why not vote for him? Mr. Meese's supporters ask. Wasn't their man cleared of any criminal wrongdoing last fall by an independent counsel? Back in September, President Reagan hailed the report of Jacob Stein, the lawyer who sifted through three years of Meese activities, as total "vindication" for his crony.

But Mr. Stein took pains to note that his charge was simply to review the record to determine whether there was criminal misconduct worthy of indictment. Though he found insufficient evidence to recommend charging Mr. Meese, the counsel noted that he lacked authority to pass judgment on the "propriety or the ethics" of Mr. Meese's activities.

Fortunately, Archibald Cox—former Watergate prosecutor, retired Harvard law professor and now chairman of the public interest organization Common Cause—has taken up the challenge at least to air those doubts that senators should be expressing. This is the first time, Prof. Cox notes, that Common Cause has ever opposed a Cabinet-level appointment.

But the unusual step is clearly justified, as Mr. Cox's 37-page review of the Stein report shows. Left up in the air are allegations that federal appointments were arranged by the attorney general-designate for individuals who helped him financially. Mr. Meese admits that he failed to comply with the law when he did not disclose a $15,000 interest-free loan to his wife. And the details surrounding the sale of his California home still invite charges of favors done for favors received.

"The White House response (to the Stein report) has created the impression that Mr. Meese has been cleared of all wrongdoing and that no legitimate hurdle remains to prevent his confirmation," Mr. Cox recently noted. But Mr. Stein's research did anything but lay the groundwork for exoneration.

Indeed, as Mr. Cox claimed, "the information . . . reveals a man who is not fit to serve as attorney general."

Coupled with the issue of Mr. Meese's finances is the matter of the Carter briefing book caper from the 1980 campaign debate. Most of us may consider that ancient history, but the fact remains that the attorney general-designate has not responded to questions about his role, if any, in acquiring or using the documents. When questioned about it by the Senate Judiciary Committee, he was sarcastic, derisive and, ultimately, offensive.

Mr. Meese's champions claim that the real reason that Common Cause and others are keeping these matters alive is political. The attorney general-designate is too conservative, they claim, and his ideology, not his ethical conduct, is the real issue.

Hogwash! What is political is Ronald Reagan's determination to appoint an old-time chum to a post for which he is unqualified in virtually every way. The best way that the Republican-dominated Senate can assert its independence is to let Mr. Reagan know that Ed Meese simply won't be acceptable as the nation's No. 1 law enforcer.

[From the Milford (NH) Cabinet, Dec. 27, 1984]

BUT WHY EDWIN MEESE?

Archibald Cox helped to set the record straight when he said last week that the fact that there may be no grounds to prosecute Edwin Meese III, the President's choice to become Attorney General, does not mean that he is ethically fit to hold the post. Common Cause, of which Cox is chairman, is urging people to write their senators and representatives asking them to oppose Meese's confirmation.

The President's sense of personal loyalty may be commendable, but the Meese nomination does nothing to build confidence in the judgment of the administration.—WBR.

[From the Middletown (CT) Press, Dec. 26, 1984]

THE MEESE APPOINTMENT

When the Congress reconvenes, one of the first matters it will take up will be the confirmation hearing of Edwin Meese as attorney general. While Meese has been investigated and not found to be indictable, his judgments leave much to be desired. Archibald Cox, the Watergate prosecutor who is now the chairman of Common Cause, has commented on the report of the Independent Counsel, and he says, "The uncontradicted evidence in the report shows that Mr. Meese repeatedly participated in appointing to high government positions individuals who had done or were doing him financial favors or who were affiliated with an organization that had done him financial favors or who were affilated with an organization that had done him financial favors." Cox has spelled out his objections to confirmation on the following grounds:

"(a) After receiving a $40,000 loan arranged by John McKean to relieve his financial distress, Mr. Meese supported the nomination of McKean to fill a vacancy on the Postal Board of Governors before the four-member Senior Staff Personnel Committee of which Mr. Meese was a member. Later, after receiving not only a further loan but also Mr. McKean's agreement to defer $12,000 in interest payments, some of which were in arrears, Mr. Meese as a member of the four-member Senior Staff Personnel Committee, joined in approving McKean for a position providing a longer term on the Postal Board of Governors desired by Mr. McKean.

"(b) On January 7, 1981, Mrs. Meese, with Mr. Meese's approval, received an unsecured, interest-free $15,000 loan from Edwin Thomas, a close friend, which Mr. Meese omitted from his financial disclosure report although plainly required. Thomas went to work under Mr. Meese in last January as Assistant Counsellor to the President.

"(c) While he was heavily in debt to Great American First Savings Bank, had received forbearance of monthly payments on some of his loans, and was in default on one of his loans, Mr. Meese participated in decisions to name Bank officials to government positions—again without disclosing the danger of conflicting interests.

"(d) While Mr. Meese was suffering financial difficulty partly because of inability to find a buyer for his California house, Pendleton James, who had recently left his position as White House Director of Personnel, asked Thomas Barrack to provide Mr. Meese with assistance. Barrack quickly arranged a very favorable sale. At the same time Barrack was pursuing a federal appointment under Pendleton James's sponsorship. The evidence, while not conclusive, makes a convincing showing that Mr. Meese must have known that Barrack was interested in a federal job. Mr. Meese was also sent a copy of letters sent by Mr. James to five Cabinet secretaries using his Meese's name in pressing Mr. Barrack for appointment. Without revealing his link to Mr. Barrack, Mr. Meese was one of the four-member Senior Staff Personnel Committee that recommended Mr. Barrack for Assistant Secretary of Commerce.

"(4) In each of these instances Mr. Meese violated Executive Order 11222, which proscribes conduct: '. . . which might result in, or create the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person; . . . losing complete independence or impartiality of action. . . .' To accept financial assistance and thereafter join in appointing one's benefactor to public office creates "the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment' and of 'losing complete independence or impartiality of action.' "

This kind of behavior raises a number of questions. It undermines public confidence in the office, it sets a poor example for others, and it raises the question of whether the individual himself, in dealing with those of whom he is indebted, can even be sure himself that he is being even-handed. Quite apart from the fact that Meese has no broad legal experience or high attainments at the law, his major problem is that he has been blind to the ethical conduct required of a high government official. He should not be confirmed as attorney general, no matter how firm a friend of the president he may be.

[From the Middletown (NY) Times Herald Record, Jan. 4, 1985]

PUT AN END TO MEESE'S MISERY

Edwin Meese has been dangling in the wind for a year, waiting to be appointed attorney general of the United States. It's time to end his misery—cut him down and tell him to forget about the job.

He is not suited for the top criminal justice position in the country.

President Reagan first nominated Meese for the job a year ago. A slew of charges arose concerning apparent improprieties, possible illegalities and dubious ethics. An independent counsel appointed to investigate the charges cleared Meese of the illegalities, but declined comment on the propriety or ethics of Meese's behavior.

A case is now being made for Meese's nomination based on the counsel's report. A counter case is being pressed, most notably by Common Cause, based on the issues the report failed to address. The Senate Judiciary Committee is expected to hear both sides later this month.

Meese, the president's chief counsel, accepted a variety of financial favors—loans, an irregular Army Reserve promotion, questionable mortgage deals and sale of his house—from people who later were appointed to lucrative federal jobs, with his help. The report said there was no basis for prosecution. Period.

Common Cause—and common sense—say that's not enough. Absence of evidence of criminal wrongdoing does not automatically qualify someone to be attorney general. Nominees for high public office, particularly that of attorney general, must answer to a higher standard. They must avoid even the appearance of giving preferential treatment to an organization or person because the public must have complete confidence in the attorney general as an independent, impartial officer of the government. That requirement is part of an Executive Order that defines moral principles required among high public officials.

Much of Meese's testimony before the independent counsel consisted of not remembering transactions or conversations or not being aware that interest-free loans had to be reported, by law, as income. That is hardly an encouraging performance from a lawyer who aspires to head the Justice Department and it certainly makes one wonder how (or if) Meese would investigate similar behavior by other government officials.

It is heartening to learn that there is no evidence Meese intended to abuse his position at the president's side to achieve personal gain. No one gains from wishing others ill. But it is disheartening to think that someone so insensitive to the appearance of impropriety and so apparently unaware of the law could seriously be considered for so sensitive a position as attorney general.

[From the New London (CT) Day, Dec. 24, 1984]

MEESE: A SHOO-IN IN SPITE OF HIMSELF

Unless lightning strikes, the Senate is likely to approve Edwin Meese III as attorney general. If it does, it will follow tradition by declining to defeat a president's nomination for the Cabinet. Not since 1959 was a nominee turned aside. Nonetheless, the Senate will be wrong.

Meese has demonstrated that he is insensitive to the ethical consideration that go hand-in-glove with high government office and particularly with the job of attorney general.

Common Cause director Archibald Cox, the distinguished former Harvard Law School professor, says naming Meese as attorney general will ignore evidence that the man disregarded conflicts and improprieties in his government service. Cox ought to know disrespect for ethical considerations when he sees them. As the lawyer first appointed special prosecutor for the Watergate affair, Cox was breathing down Richard Nixon's neck when the former president fired him.

Jacob Stein, the special counsel assigned to Meese's case, reported that he found no evidence that Meese violated any federal laws in his dealings in the government. But as Common Cause and Cox correctly point out, Stein did not address the ethical considerations in the case and did not answer the question whether Meese is fit to hold the nation's highest law enforcement post.

Regardless of the Senate's likeliness of approving Meese's nomination the arguments for turning him down are numerous and persuasive.

Meese received aid from John McKean in obtaining $60,000 in loans and McKean subsequently was named chairman of the Postal Service's Board of Directors. As White House counsel, Meese has a major voice in patronage appointments such as the one McKean received.

Bank officers who arranged $480,000 in credit assisting Meese to buy a new home in Washington before selling his house in California received federal jobs. They also allowed Meese to delay 15 months worth of mortgage payments on his loans.

Thomas Barrack, a California real estate developer who in effect contributed $83,000 out of his own pocket so someone could buy Meese's $300,000 home in California, ended up as an assistant secretary of the Interior Department. Meese could not remember playing any role in the appointment of Barrack.

Meese at first listed as moving expenses some $10,000 in trust funds arranged to provide transition money for Reagan administration officials as the president was taking office. But when apprised that the Justice Department probably would consider payment of such moving expenses illegal, Meese listed the money as consulting fees and reported them as income on tax returns.

Maybe Meese is being honest in saying there was no quid pro quo between him and people who made loans and later got federal employment. Maybe Special Counsel Stein was correct to believe Meese when he said he had lapses of memory in failing to report the interest-free loan and in not remembering conversations about patronage jobs for individuals who had helped him financially.

But even if the public stretches the point by believing Stein and Meese on the ethical considerations, it must conclude that Meese is a bungler. In short, he's hardly the kind of alert, thoughtful and ethically sensitive person most Americans want in charge of the Justice Department.

[From the New Republic, Jan. 21, 1985]

WHAT A MEESE!

By last spring it had become clear that Ed Meese couldn't be confirmed as Attorney General as long as suspicions remained about why so many of his financial benefactors had obtained government jobs. So Mr. Meese did a smart thing. He asked the Justice Department to appoint an independent counsel to decide whether or not to indict him—thus shifing public attention from the question of his fitness to be Attorney General to the question of his criminality. Last September Independent Counsel Jacob Stein decided that, on balance, Mr. Meese was not a criminal. President Reagan hailed the report as conclusive proof that the charges against Mr. Meese were "baseless." He demanded that the Senate swiftly confirm his friend. Most Senators seem eager to go along with this post post-Watergate mentality: if you're not indicted, you're a Boy Scout.

Well, we hate to be the only bluenoses in town, but we still have our doubts about Mr. Meese's qualifications. Mr. Stein himself emphasized that he could not meet a request from Mr. Meese's lawyers to dispel charges of "moral turpitude" against Mr. Meese. And the Stein report makes it clear that its conclusion doesn't mean there was no evidence of criminal conduct. The report depended also on "prosecutorial discretion"—subjective judgments about the severity of Mr. Meese's offenses and how difficult it would be to gain a conviction. Indeed, far from finding that the charges against Mr. Meese were baseless, the Stein report introduces damning new evidence, some of which is at odds with testimony given during Mr. Meese's confirmation hearings. (Scandal connoisseurs who want to learn more should consult articles by Christopher Hitchens in the December 29-January 5 issue of The Nation and Julie Kosterlitz in the January-February Common Cause.)

Mr. Meese, who always had to struggle to keep up with his wealthy California friends, invited trouble in the first place by living beyond his means. Then he relied on the kindness of those friends (and even strangers) to bail him out. Mr. Stein couldn't prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Mr. Meese knew his financial angels wanted government jobs—largely because Mr. Meese couldn't recall dozens of crucial events and document. But it's hard to believe that Mr. Meese wasn't aware of what they were after.

Take the case of Thomas Barrack. In the summer of 1982, the Meeses wanted desperately to sell their San Diego home. Not only was their bank about to foreclose on the place, but they were also behind in payments on their $250,000 home in suburban Virginia. At the request of Mr. Meese's friend, Pendleton James, who had just stepped down as White House personnel chief, Mr. Barrack (whom Mr. Meese barely knew) came to the rescue. By September 1, Mr. Barrack had arranged a complicated sale which involved shelling out $83,000 of his own money.

Mr. Barrack then set about looking for a federal job. At Mr. Meese's confirmation hearings, Mr. Barrack said he never met with Mr. Meese during his job hunt. But the Stein report shows that Mr. Meese and Mr. Barrack met no fewer than four times that fall. After a meeting in Washington on September 8, Mr. Barrack sent Mr. Meese a letter thanking him for his "counsel and encouragement." On November 9 the Meeses has dinner in Georgetown; earlier that day Mr. Barrack had met with two cabinet officers about possible jobs. (Pendleton James was supposed to be there too, but had to cancel at the last minute. He asked Mrs. Meese if she and her husband would recognize Mr. Barrack. Mrs. Meese replied, "Oh, we'll recognize him. He'll be the one with a halo around his head.") Mr. Meese and his wife stayed at Mr. Barrack's California ranch over the Thanksgiving holiday, by which time James Watt had created a job for Mr. Barrack at the Interior Department. And on December 2 Mr. Barrack showed up at Mr. Meese's birthday party; the day before, he had started working for Mr. Watt. But Mr. Meese is not a curious man. He claims he didn't ask about Mr. Barrack's job hunt on any of these occasions.

Yet another murky series of events centers on the $10,000 Mr. Meese received from the Presidential Transition Trust in November 1980. Mr. Meese testified to the Senate Judiciary Committee that the money was a "consulting fee." According to the Stein report, however, the $10,000 check was marked "moving expenses" when Mr. Meese cashed it on November 22. Later the check stubs were changed to read "consulting fees." Why the switch? No one remembers exactly. But Peter McPherson, a lawyer who headed the Transition Trust, testified to Mr. Stein that he told Mr. Meese in early December that it was illegal to use the trust's money for moving expenses. According to Mr. McPherson, Mr. Meese told him to drop the matter—but didn't mention that he'd already cashed a check for moving expenses. Also, fellow White House aide Michael Deaver told Mr. Stein that Mr. Meese said he'd try to find a source of cash to help

Mr. Deaver make the move east, but later told him that "the lawyers" wouldn't permit it.

The only thing Mr. Meese claims to remember about all this is that he heard—somewhere—that there would be a "problem" with being paid moving expenses, and ordered the checks changed. Is Mr. Meese saying that he changed the records, but doesn't know why? (He never submitted a bill for consulting.) In a particularly generous bit of prosecutorial discretion, Mr. Stein came up with an innocent explanation. "Mr. Meese . . . did substantial work for [the Trust] . . . and thus was entitled to compensation for his services. Despite questions as to who authorized the changes . . . the records of the Trust were changed to reflect the revised purpose of the checks as consulting fees. On the basis of the above, we do not believe a violation . . . by Mr. Meese could be established."

We could go on and on. At a meeting on November 8, 1982, Mr. Meese and a San Francisco accountant, John McKean, agreed to defer $12,000 in interest payments Mr. Meese owed Mr. McKean. At the same meeting the two discussed extending Mr. McKean's appointment on the Postal Board of Governors. But Mr. Meese insists "there was never any connection in his mind" between the two matters. Contrary to what Mr. Meese implied at his confirmation hearings the Secretary of the Army warned Mr. Meese—in a memo and a phone call—that it would at the very least create a bad appearance to grant Mr. Meese's request for a highly unusual (and highly lucrative) promotion in the Army Reserve. Mr. Meese took the promotion anyway. He claims not to remember the memo, even though the Stein investigators tried to refresh his memory by showing him a copy which he himself had mailed back to the Secretary. (Interestingly enough, the Stein report is silent on the question of whether Mr. Meese remembers the phone call.)

But you get the picture. The Stein report goes on for 400 pages and one searches in vain for signs that Mr. Meese ever thought of calling a halt to the monkey business being conducted on his behalf. He may not have done anything provably criminal, but his behavior was hardly what we'd expect from the nation's highest law enforcement officer. Mr. Meese's nomination comes up again at the end of this month, and the Administration wants a no-muss, no-fuss confirmation. The Senate shouldn't go along.

[From the New York Times, Dec. 20, 1984]

QUESTIONS FOR MR. MEESE

To be cleared of criminal suspicion is a relief but not a qualification for high office. Yet when a court-appointed independent counsel found no basis for indicting Edwin Meese in September, President Reagan saw the judgment as "vindication" of his nomination to be Attorney General. Now Robert Dole, the new Senate majority leader, says Mr. Meese, having endured Judiciary Committee grilling and a six-month special investigation, merits swift confirmation next month.

That skips an important step, as a new report by Common Cause makes clear. Before confirming Mr. Meese, the Senate needs to confront the ethical questions raised but not resolved in the report of the special counsel, Jacob Stein. It was beyond Mr. Stein's mandate to state an opinion of Mr. Meese's fitness for the highest law enforcement office. But the facts recited in his report call for analysis by the Senate.

Of chief concern are a number of financial favors for Mr. Meese around the time that, as the President's counselor, he helped his benefactors get Federal jobs. The Stein investigation uncovered no evil motive, or even conscious pattern in those favors. But Mr. Meese needs finally to explain why he sees no connections between favors received and extended, and why he senses no ethical danger in those transactions.

For example, Mr. Meese's promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve, though in no sense criminal, was highly irregular. Lacking the educational requirements, he was given "constructive educational credit" and the promotion—and then recommended an unusual second term for the chief of army reserves who had awarded that credit. Mr. Meese's well-based intercession, with the Secretaries of the Army and Defense, was successful.

Curiously, Mr. Meese couldn't recall either a memorandum or telephone call from former Secretary of the Army John Marsh advising that it would be better for him to wait a year for a more regular-seeming promotion. Such forgetfulness ran through Mr. Meese's Senate testimony and also his response to Mr. Stein.

An Attorney General needs a good memory and a sharp eye for impropriety. The Office helps set an administration's moral tone. The Senate cannot responsibly confirm Mr. Meese without getting better answers to the questions of ethics and appearances that his case raises.

REAGAN'S POOR CHOICE

One of the new year's political hangovers is President Reagan's continuing desire to have White House aide Edwin Meese confirmed as U.S. attorney general. A president ought to be able to have his choice of Cabinet members—as long as the choice possesses the basic qualities of good judgment and a sharp mind needed in the top echelons of the federal government. Unfortunately, on the evidence at hand, Mr. Meese fails that test.

We defended Mr. Meese a year ago, when the president first nominated him, because the opposition seemed petty and politically inspired. But as revelations about Mr. Meese's behavior continued, a pattern became apparent: People who helped Mr. Meese and his wife out of financial trouble got cushy government jobs. A man who loaned Mr. Meese $40,000 became a member of the Postal Board of Governors; a man who gave Mrs. Meese an interest-free, unsecured loan went to work as an assistant to the president; a man who arranged the sale of Mr. Meese's house at favorable terms was recommended by Mr. Meese for assistant secretary of commerce. There was more, and Mr. Meese, when questioned about the incidents, could never remember the facts of the cases.

Because of questions raised by these revelations, the Senate Judiciary Committee suspended Mr. Meese's confirmation hearings last year until a special prosecutor, Jacob Stein, could investigate. Mr. Stein found "no basis" for prosecuting Mr. Meese under criminal statutes, but declined to deal with the ethical questions involved. However, even if Mr. Stein did not himself comment on Mr. Meese's ethics, the details unearthed in his investigation confirmed that Mr. Meese was guilty of poor judgment and had shown little regard for the ethical standards that should govern the actions of a public official—especially one who aspires to be the nation's top law-enforcement officer.

Federal Executive Order 11222, "Prescribing Standards of Ethical Conduct for Government Officers and Employers," which has been in effect since 1965, prohibits activity by federal officials—including White House aides such as Mr. Meese—which ". . . might result in, or create the appearance [emphasis added] of using public office for private gain; . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person; . . . or affecting adversely the confidence of the public in the integrity of the government."

Mr. Meese certainly has—on more than one occasion—engaged in activity that created appearances that affect adversely the confidence of the public in the integrity of the government. To put it simply: He sets a bad example.

The second set of hearings on his confirmation begin soon. Unless political cronyism and ethical blindness are prerequisites for attorney general, the Senate should reject the president's unfortunate choice.

MEESE'S MODEST QUALIFICATIONS

Archibald Cox, the high-minded Watergate prosecutor, says Ed Meese is unfit to be U.S. attorney general.

He's right, but not neccessarily for the reasons he cites.

Cox is most concerned about Meese's "utter insensitivity to ethical standards."

That's a valid point. When ethics were ladled out, Meese was playing golf. But Washington's hide is well scarred with character lapse.

Even more to the point in the Meese nomination are his professional qualifications.

To say the kindest, they are modest.

Meese was deputy district attorney of California's Alameda County. He directed a Center for Criminal Justice Policy at a San Diego law school.

That's it, so far as law goes. Yet he is slated to be our top law official.

We have hundreds of men and women who are better grounded in law and the Constitution. No, we have thousands.

Meese is a businessman, troubleshooter and politician. He also is a good buddy of the president.

He qualifies to be "crony-general," as the Chicago Tribune puts it. But is good buddyism the way to pick cabinet officials?

[From the Rochester (NY) Sunday Democrat and Chronicle, Dec. 23, 1984]

HE WOULDN'T BE A GOOD CHOICE

Archibald Cox, the first Watergate Special Prosecutor and a man who knows much about the need for integrity in government, has now, as Common Cause chairman, urged the Senate not to confirm former presidential counselor Edwin Meese III to the post of attorney general.

It will be recalled that an independent counsel, Jacob A. Stein, found no basis for prosecuting Meese for any violation of federal criminal law. He also declined to evaluate Meese's fitness to become attorney general as a question that lay beyond his jurisdiction. Stein's investigation had focused on allegations that Meese had helped arrange positions in the Reagan Administration for individuals who had assisted him financially and that he had failed to disclose an interest-free loan to his wife.

Though he may be legally in the clear, Meese, as Cox points out, has not displayed the judgment and the high ethical standards required of an attorney general. Cox in fact says bluntly that Meese has shown a "lack of ethical sensitivity" and "blindness to abuse of position."

If it is sensitive to the need for an untarnished reputation in a post as critical as that of attorney general, the Senate will vote against confirmation.

[From the Salt Lake City Deseret News, Jan. 5, 1985]

MEESE STILL NOT BEST MAN TO BE ATTORNEY GENERAL

President Reagan's support and loyalty to his friends usually are understandable and even admirable. But some of the president's warmest backers are wishing he would nominate somebody besides Edwin Meese for the sensitive post of U.S. attorney general.

Reagan picked Meese a year ago for the country's No. 1 law enforcement job, but so many disturbing questions were raised in Senate hearings about Meese's activities that a special prosecutor was named to examine the allegations.

The questions included certain unreported loans and subsequent government jobs for the lenders, stock deals, gifts received, Meese's military promotion, and various fees and favors by or for Meese.

Eventually, the investigation found no evidence that would call for prosecution of Meese under federal law—a rather restrained report that still left a certain uneasiness about Meese's judgment in his personal affairs.

Undaunted by all of this, President Reagan this week re-nominated Meese for the attorney general job, a post that supposedly represents a life-long ambition for the former county prosecutor and law professor from California.

Although his legal background is not a particularly distinguished one, Meese is qualified in a narrow legal sense to be attorney general. And a president obviously should be free to name trusted associates to top administrative positions.

After all, Meese has been with the president a long time, serving as his chief of staff in Reagan's days as governor of California.

But the job of attorney general is unlike that of adviser or head of a federal agency, although it is both of those, too. The attorney general is the top law enforcement official in the nation and must have the confidence of his countrymen as well as the president.

After all his troubles, that public confidence in Meese is not particularly strong. His appointment will be seen by some as merely political cronyism.

No doubt President Reagan—particularly after his landslide re-election—will be able to push Meese's nomination through the Senate, but it won't be without opposition from people who see Meese as "insensitive" to issues of civil rights and civil liberties.

With all the dedicated, skilled and worthy people in America who might fill the attorney general post with distinction, it's a shame that the president is going with friendship and a man who remains under something of a cloud.

[From the Scottsdale (AZ) Daily Progress, Jan. 9, 1985]

ROUND 2 FOR MEESE

President Reagan has nominated his friend Edwin Meese to be the next attorney general of the United States. In preliminary Senate hearings last summer, Meese was charged with violating the law by using his position as presidential counselor to do favors for friends who had helped him financially.

After a lengthy investigation, special counsel Jacob Stein reported that Meese had not actually broken the law. The report, however, did not present an opinion on the ethical conduct of the nominee.

That issue now will confront the Senate Judiciary Committee. Meese will have to explain why he believes it is proper to grant favors to persons who have helped him financially.

In addition, Meese will have to explain his promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve when he lacked the normal experience requirements. And he must explain why he then recommended the chief of the reserves for an unusual second term.

The attorney general should have a broad legal background as a practitioner. Meese's legal background is limited and is largely political.

But the heart of the matter is whether the nominee has the moral qualifications for the job. He should be totally above suspicion and incorruptible, for the office sets a moral standard for the nation.

Based on his past record, Meese fails these ethical tests. His nomination should be turned down by the Senate.

[From the Seattle (WA) Times, Dec. 31, 1984]

TRADITION FAVORS MEDIOCRE NOMINEE

Forecasts that the Senate soon will confirm President Reagan's nomination of Edwin Meese III as attorney general are based on a tradition that senators rarely second-guess Cabinet choices, no matter how mediocre.

In all of U.S. history, in fact, Cabinet nominees have been rejected only eight times, most of them in the 1800s. The most recent was 1959, when Dwight Eisenhower's choice of Lewis Strauss as commerce secretary was rebuffed by only three votes.

But if tradition is on Meese's side as his nomination comes up for a vote in the new Congress, few of the questions raised almost a year ago, when Reagan first proposed him as successor to William French Smith, have been answered satisfactorily.

Those questions centered largely on Meese's role in getting federal jobs for people who had helped him get out of some financial difficulties. To dispose of what Meese called "baseless insinuations," the nominee asked for and got a five-month investigation by a Justice Department-appointed special prosecutor, Jacob A. Stein.

Stein reported in September that he would have "no comment on Meese's ethics and the propriety of his conduct or an evaluation of his fitness for office." That, he said, was beyond his mandate. Instead, Stein said only that he could find no basis for prosecuting Meese for violation of any criminal statute.

Meese said he was "very happy" with the report, and the White House issued statements leaving an impression that the nominee had been "cleared" of problems impeding his appointment as the nation's top legal officer.

Common Cause, the citizens' lobby, rightly served notice that it will continue to oppose the nomination. Archibald Cox, Common Cause chairman, said that despite the special counsel's report, Meese's past conduct "shows that he is blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official."

Other critics have noted Meese's limited credentials in the legal field.

About the best that can be said of Meese is that he has been politically loyal to Reagan. If the Senate does indeed confirm his appointment, it will be a sad commentary on the system for determining fitness for high public office.

[From the Spokane (WA) Spokesman-Review, Jan. 5, 1985]

MEESE IS A POOR CHOICE FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL JOB

President Reagan created an untimely political problem for the Senate and cast an unfortunate shadow on the ethical integrity of his administration by renominating his longtime friend, Edwin Meese III, as U.S. attorney general this week.

Consideration of the Meese nomination is likely to tie the Senate in political knots at a time when it ought to be concentrating on the many crucial issues it must resolve this year, such as the federal budget deficit.

The ongoing controversy over Meese's nomination also will mire the Reagan administration in renewed doubts about its regard for the appearance of ethical integrity—at a time when the administration needs public confidence and a fresh start on the nation's problems.

Meese would not inspire confidence, either in the administration generally or in the high office for which he has been nominated.

True, a special prosecutor, after investigating 11 allegations of wrongdoing, found that there are no grounds to charge Meese with a crime.

But the prosecutor took pains to point out that his report was limited to the question of criminal violations and could not address the question of ethical violations and Meese's fitness for the position of attorney general.

As the top law enforcement official in the nation, the attorney general should be a lawyer of the highest caliber, with ethical integrity that is beyond reproach.

Perhaps no crime occurred when several people who furnished Meese with personal financial aid obtained federal jobs or when the presidential counselor was promoted to colonel and transferred from the Army's retired reserve to its ready reserve in 1981 (thus, Meese acquired a larger pension), without completing necessary course work.

But it looks bad, and integrity as well as the appearance of integrity is essential to high public office.

Ordinarily, the Senate respects a president's choices for his Cabinet. However, if the Senate takes its confirmation role seriously, it must consider the need for top government officials to have not only the fact but also the appearance of integrity, so as to inspire respect and trust in the public they serve.

To be cleared of criminal wrongdoing by a special prosecutor is not enough. The fact a special prosecutor was needed at all is cause for concern. So many doubts have arisen about Meese that he is a poor candidate for this important position.

Clearly, there are many lawyers of high caliber, conservative philosophy and impeccable reputation who would be acceptable to President Reagan and who would serve well in the office of attorney general, without inspiring public cynicism and distrust.

Meese does not belong in that office, nor does he deserve the Senate's confirmation.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Dec. 23, 1984]

NO VINDICATION ON CHARACTER

Should Edwin Meese, the White House counselor, be confirmed as attorney general? Breaking its tradition of never having opposed a Cabinet-level nomination, the respected and nonpartisan citizens' lobby, Common Cause, says No. The reasoning behind that unusual judgment is solid and deserves the most serious consideration by the Senate, which must confirm President Reagan's selection.

Common Cause bases its conclusion on the report, issued in September, by Special Prosecutor Jacob Stein, who investigated a wide assortment of charges of wrongdoing that had been leveled against Mr. Meese. Chief among these were allegations that Mr. Meese had improperly helped put persons who had assisted him financially into high positions in the Reagan administration and that he had failed to report, as required, a $15,000 interest-free loan to his wife. Both Mr. Meese and the president say that the prosecutor's finding, which absolved Mr. Meese of criminal behavior, have vindicated him. But Archibald Cox, Common Cause chairman and the first Watergate special prosecutor, says the report does no such thing.

To understand why, it is important to keep clear the exact purpose and intent of Mr. Stein's report. That is the only way to appreciate the significance of what it said and what if did not. A special prosecutor's only charge is to determine whether cause exists for criminal action against a high federal official. He has no mandate—and indeed it would be inappropriate for him to assume one—for any other investigation into that official. Hence's the question of Mr. Meese's fitness for attorney general was beyond Mr. Stein's charter. Properly, it was left unaddressed in the report.

Mr. Stein found no evidence that Mr. Meese had engaged in crimes, such as bribery, which had been suggested by the apparent quid pro quo of financial help for him and federal jobs for his benefactors. But the 385 pages of the Stein report constitute a deep reservoir of facts—about loans to Mr. Meese and other matters—that ought to be deeply disturbing to those who must vote on his confirmation.

Was it good judgment to accept the money and then assist the lenders to obtain federal positions? Was it ethical for Mr. Meese to redesignate a $10,000 payment from a Reagan presidential transition trust from "moving expenses to "consulting fees"—after learning that the former might well have been a violation of criminal law? Was it proper for Mr. Meese to recommend a second term as chief of Army Reserves to the officer who made possible his promotion to reserve colonel, although Mr. Meese lacked the formal educational requirements for the rank?

The criminal possibilities in those questions have been answered by the special prosecutor. But the issues of judgment, ethics, and sensitivity to propriety—in short, the question of character—remain unsettled. The nation's highest law enforcement officer must have impeccable credentials on these matters; and here, the verdict of the Stein report has not vindicated Mr. Meese.

[From the St. Petersburg (FL) Times, Dec. 20, 1984]

COMMON CAUSE'S LOST CAUSE?

There are compelling reasons why Edwin Meese, the presidential counsellor, should not be allowed to become attorney general of the United States. Someone who has been so openly contemptuous of civil rights is implausibly cast as head of the department that's supposed to enforce civil rights. Someone who so often has been blind to the appearance of conflict of interest on his own part is an unacceptable candidate to police the ethics of others.

But Washington reasons in strange ways. Meese, having submitted to thorough scrutiny by an independent counsel under the Ethics in Government Act, was found to have done nothing for which he could be prosecuted criminally. The independent counsel, Jacob A. Stein, took pains to point out in his report that he wasn't passing judgment on Meese's ethics. The Senate, however, seems to have eyes only for the other parts, which say in effect that Meese is not a crook. His confirmation is said to be assured.

That would set a shabby standard for one of the nation's highest and most sensitive offices. Meese's conduct, however immune to prosecution, smells of chronic cronyism, a conveniently feeble memory and a galling insensitivity to the urgent need to keep the President's office above suspicion.

Stein's report did not deny that Meese's wife had borrowed $15,000, to play the stock market, from one of Meese's White House employees, Edwin W. Thomas. He said simply that the loan had nothing to do with subsequent federal patronage appointments for Thomas and Thomas' wife and son. Yet Meese forgot to report that outstanding loan on his financial disclosure forms. Stein reasoned that Thomas had many other friends of long standing in the Reagan White House, including the President himself, and could have gotten jobs without Meese's help. Even so, Meese should have reported the loan. One might understand how a rich man might overlook such a debt. But Meese wasn't rich. The circumstances may not spell criminal conduct, but they raise profound questions about Meese's attentiveness to important details.

Stein also acknowledged that Meese had involved himself with the appointment to the Postal Service Board of Governors of a California man who had provided him with a personal loan, and with other appointments to four men connected with a bank that had carried an overdue mortgage on Meese's California house. Meese disclosed those transactions properly. But why didn't he also disqualify himself from having anything to do with those appointments? If his failure to do so does not require Meese to stand in a prisoner's dock, neither does it qualify him to run the Justice Department.

Happily, there are still people who believe that high public officials should be held to the highest standards of conduct. Common Cause, the public affairs lobby, announced this week that it will oppose Meese before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Washington wisdom says that's a lost cause. But the chairman of Common Cause is a person who knows something about matters like that. He is Archibald Cox, the one-time Watergate special prosecutor who preferred to be fired rather than compromise on principle. History will remember who was right this time, too, regardless of the immediate outcome.

[From the Syracuse Herald-Journal, Dec. 5, 1984]

MEESE: THE AWFUL APPOINTMENT THAT SIMPLY WON'T GO AWAY

As soon as Bob Dole was crowned king of the Senate, he started showing signs of a strange ailment.

His mind goes blank whenever Edwin Meese III, friend of the president and financial finagler extraordinaire, is discussed. It may be catching; Meese's problem also involves memory lapse.

One of Dole's first promises as Majority Leader was to push for a vote on Meese's appointment as attorney general. Given his powerful position, if Dole wants a vote he'll get a vote.

And he'll probably get Meese confirmed, which would be an insulting disregard of the job description for the attorny general. He or she is supposed to be the nation's top law enforcement officer.

It's reasonable to expect high standards of conduct from anyone in that post. That's why we choke at the thought of Meese.

Soon after President Reagan nominated him, allegations about Meese's financial sleights of hand began surfacing. A special prosecutor was appointed but, on Sept. 20, he decided there was "no basis" under federal law for prosecuting Meese.

Senator Dole sees that as complete exoneration. "I think we've held Ed Meese hostage long enough," he said Sunday.

Poor Ed Meese. There he is, chained to his White House desk and forced to stay in a $60,000-plus job when he could be having fun as the nation's top cop.

Meese was cleared legally, it's true, but he certainly wasn't cleared ethically. The special prosecutor didn't say Meese did nothing wrong—nothing as clearcut as that. He chose his terminology carefully. The prosecutor found "no substantial evidence of any motive" to conceal questionable financial deals. Meese's explanations for omissions were "credible," prosecutor Jacob Stein said.

We'd call that a less than wholehearted exoneration—with good reason. Consider one of several accusations against Meese: He "forgot" to report a $15,000 interest-free loan to his wife from an old friend, Edwin Thomas. Later, Thomas, his wife and son got federal jobs. All just coincidences, the special prosecutor assures us.

Right. We're expected to believe a man with serious financial difficulties stemming from problems selling his California home would forget a loan amounting to one-fourth of his salary. And we're expected to believe he forgot or overlooked other financial favors from powerful people.

Dole accepts all this with blind faith—or he has forgotten Meese's past.

Senators should give the nominee the benefit of doubt legally. He's entitled to that. Then they should consider if his conduct meets the high ethical standards required of an attorney general.

On that count, Meese is entitled to no such benefit of doubt.

[From the Tacoma News Tribune, Jan. 4, 1985]

MEESE DOESN'T DESERVE JOB

There's a strong chance taxpayers will get stuck with all or part of the huge legal bills presidential counselor Edwin Meese ran up defending himself in an ethics investigation.

But that doesn't mean they should get stuck with Ed Meese as U.S. attorney general, too.

A judge will rule soon on Meese's request for government reimbursement of his legal bills, incurred during a special prosecutor's five-month investigation of allegations against Meese. A new federal law allows for such payment.

The special prosecutor concluded in September there was no basis for filing criminal charges against Meese, but that was not enough to dispel the ethical questions that cloud Meese's record. Among other things, Meese repeatedly "participated in appointreport a $15,000 personal loan from a friend he subsequently hired as his White House deputy.

Archibald Cox, former Watergate special prosecutor and chairman of the Common Cause citizens lobby, noted that Meese violated a federal executive order barring even the appearance of conflict of interest by public officials. After examining the report on Meese, Cox concluded recently that Meese repeatedly"participated in appointing to high government positions individuals who had done or were doing him financial favors . . ."

While Meese may have intended no wrongdoing, Cox added, "his past conduct shows, however, that he is blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official."

Cox's criticisms of Meese stem from a well-known scrupulousness rather than partisan politics. It's unfortunate that President Reagan chose to ignore this and instead resubmitted Meese's nomination to the Senate yesterday. The nation's top legal officer should be someone of spotless reputation; Edwin Meese doesn't fit the bill. The Senate should act accordingly.

[From the Tallahassee Democrat, Jan. 9, 1985]

MEESE—NOT QUALIFIED TO BE NOMINEE

Ed Meese, former counselor to President Reagan and now his nominee for U.S. attorney general, says he has been completely vindicated by the report of an independent counsel appointed to consider charges brought against him during Senate confirmation hearings.

Not quite.

Washington lawyer Jacob Stein found "no basis" for bringing criminal charges against Meese. He was not asked, and did not volunteer, an opinion on whether Meese violated civil law or federal regulations.

But Stein's report does not paint a picture of a careful, prudent man qualified to become the nation's chief law officer. Instead, it shows someone who, at best, is sloppy in his personal financial dealings and who, at worst, uses his position of public trust to enrich himself.

Common Cause Chairman Archibald Cox and others who continue to postpone the confirmation of Meese are correct. He is not the man for the job.

Federal regulations require that officials "avoid any action . . . which might result in, or create the appearance of, using public office for private gain; giving preferential treatment to any person (and) losing complete independence or impartiality."

Yet Meese approved the appointment of San Francisco accountant John McKean to fill an unexpired term on the Postal Board of Governors a month after McKean had arranged a $40,000 loan for him. Later, after McKean got Meese another $20,000 loan and deferred interest on the initial loan, he was appointed to a full nine-year term on the board. The Stein report says that the interest deferral and the long-term appointment were discussed by Meese and McKean at the same meeting.

Is there no appearance of preferential treatment here?

Los Angeles real estate developer Thomas Barrack arranged for the sale of Meese's California home, which had been on the market for 18 months; apparently, $83,000 of Barrack's own money was used to complete the deal. Barrack later was approved for two federal jobs. The second, as assistant secretary at the Commerce Department, required approval by Meese and three other members of the Senior Staff Personnel Committee.

Is there no appearance of preferential treatment here?

Meese was promoted from lieutenant colonel to colonel in the Army Reserve, a move that allowed him to get 26 percent greater retirement benefits when he later retired. An internal Army investigation later found Meese was promoted "not on the basis of his past military performance, but rather on the basis of national prominence."

The Stein report found "some evidence" that Meese knew that he was going to get special treatment, but did nothing to stop it. He later called Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger to recommend Gen. William Berkman for appointment to a second term as reserve chief.

Is there no appearance of special treatment here?

Surely the president can find a person better suited to be attorney general than Ed Meese.

[From the Vancouver, (WA) Columbian, Dec. 23, 1984]

COX' MEESE FIGHT IS FUTILE BUT STILL WORTH THE TRY

There's really no way that liberals and civil libertarians are going to prevent U.S. Senate consent to the nomination of Edwin Meese III as attorney general. Nonetheless, they are right to make the attempt.

As Meese's chief adversary said the other day, the nominee has been shown to be "blind to the ethical standards and obligations of a public official."

That adversary—no stranger to such standards and obligations—is Archibald Cox, now chairman of Common Cause, formerly special Watergate prosecutor and nemesis of Richard Nixon.

President Reagan insists that he will have Meese as his chief law-enforcement official and head of the Justice Department. Reagan's smashing electoral victory reinforces the traditional argument that a president should have the Cabinet he wants. The Senate is dominated by supporters of Reagan—or at least those who dare not oppose him. So nothing is surer than renomination of Meese and Senate consent to that renomination.

So why does Cox persist? Why is he joined by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, an organization described as an umbrella for more than 150 civil rights groups?

Quite apart from their concerns about Meese's sloppy bookkeeping and soft attitude on influence dealing, they are concerned about his authoritarian approach to law and conservative views of civil rights. By establishing a firm adversarial position to Meese now, they can hope to improve his tenure.

Reagan has moved beyond politics. He works now for history's judgment, and he must be aware that opponents such as Cox will help write his administration's history. Meese is Reagan's man, and he cannot relish smudging Reagan's record by offensive public behavior in high office.

In the face of Reagan's electoral mandate, any opposition to his wishes may seem futile. In a democratic society, however, opposition is necessary however vain.

TRIBUNE EDITORIALS—ED MEESE ISN'T BEYOND SUSPICION

One of the early responsibilities of the 99th Congress will be consideration by the Senate of confirmation of President Reagan's nomination of White House Counselor Edwin Meese III as Attorney General of the United States.

Meese's name was first submitted to the Senate a year ago but information developed by the news media and during Senate Judiciary Committee hearings resulted in a preliminary investigation by Attorney General William French Smith of possible criminal charges against the nominee.

An independent counsel, Jacob Stein, was appointed "to investigate any allegation or evidence of violation of any criminal law by Mr. Meese."

These included reports that Meese had accepted financial favors in return for helping individuals obtain federal jobs, that he had willfully filed false financial disclosure statements and that he had improperly obtained a promotion in the U.S. Army Reserve.

Last September the independent counsel's report was issued. It concluded there was "no basis" for indicting Meese on criminal charges. That was a reasonable conclusion, as far as it went, but information developed suggests that, if Ed Meese hadn't broken the law in fact, he had surely mangled it in spirit.

Common Cause, a citizens' lobby, is strongly opposed to the Meese nomination. Its chairman, Archibald Cox, formerly solicitor general of the United States and the first Watergate special prosecutor, says the Stein report shows that the nominee "lacks the qualities necessary to be a credible attorney general."

Cox charges that Meese:

Accepted a $40,000 loan arranged by John McKean and supported the nomination of McKean to fill a vacancy on the Postal Board of Governors.

After receiving a further loan from McKean and obtaining an agreement from him to defer $12,000 in interest payments, joined in approving his benefactor for a longer term on the Postal Board of Governors.

Participated, in decisions to name Great American First Savings Bank officials to government positions while he was heavily in debt to the institution and in default on one loan.

Accepted help in selling his California home from Thomas Barrack and subsequently recommended Barrack for Assistant Secretary of Commerce.

Accepted preferential treatment in gaining a higher rank in the Army Reserve although he had been informed by the Secretary of the Army that his promotion would not be a "regular and normal affair."

Failed to include in his financial disclosure report a $15,000 loan by Edwin Thomas to Mrs. Meese. (Thomas was appointed assistant counselor to the President and, later, administrator of the San Francisco Regional Office of the General Services Administration.)

Cox, in a statement issued last month, said, "Mr. Meese may have intended no wrong. His past conduct shows, however, that he is blind to ethical standards and obligations required of a public official."

Ed Meese's intentions may be the very best, but he has utterly failed the "Caesar's wife" test and is certainly not beyond suspicion. If his name remains before the Senate it will become the center of a prolonged and acrimonious debate which could delay consideration of more important issues.

Sherman Adams, the deposed White House chief of staff during the Eisenhower administration, was cashiered for accepting a simple vicuna coat. Meese's indiscretions are far more complicated and raise serious questions about integrity and judgment which should not be associated with an individual in the position of attorney general.

If Meese respects his President, he will do Mr. Reagan a favor and step aside now before the storm breaks over both their heads.

QUESTIONS OF CHARACTER—MEESE MIGHT NOT BE CROOKED, BUT HIS LAPSES ARE CRITICAL

The report of a special investigator concludes that Edwin Meese is not a crook, at least not an indictable one. But that declaration does not make Meese a fit candidate for attorney general.

Meese keeps repeating that he has a poor memory for detail. He also seems to have a poor grasp of ethics in government. Neither failing is desirable in an attorney general, yet the Senate seems ready to confirm Meese's nomination to become the nation's head lawyer.

Senate debate on President Reagan's nomination of his chief adviser is scheduled to resume in late January or early February. Meese would succeed William French Smith, who resigned to work on the president's re-election campaign.

The special investigator, Jacob A. Stein, reported in September that he found "no basis" for prosecuting Meese for any violation of federal criminal law. Stein refused to evaluate Meese's fitness for the office because, he said, it was beyond the scope of what he was appointed to do.

However, Stein concluded that Meese had displayed a "lack of ethical sensitivity" and a "blindness to abuse of position" as he directed federal appointments on the basis of favors done for the Reagan campaign and in the way he accepted a promotion without merit in the Army Reserve.

Stein also was assigned to investigate Meese's failure to disclose a $15,000 interest-free loan made to Meese's wife by a Reagan ally. Meese himself received payment from a trust established to finance Reagan's transition to office in 1981.

Meese pleaded poor memory on all counts. Stein found no felonious intent in Meese's actions. But that does not make those small lapses in honesty irrelevant to Meese's appointment as attorney general. That fine point was well made this week in a letter to all senators from Archibald Cox, the chairman of Common Cause, the citizens' lobby.

Meese's lapses are rather enough to reject his nomination as attorney general. It is too critical an appointment to be dictated by Senate partisanship.

[From the Abilene (TX) Reporter-News, Jan. 31, 1985]

QUESTIONS REMAIN—ED MEESE

Presidential Adviser Edwin Meese is not a crook. A special prosecutor determined as much after a painstaking investigation of Meese's financial affairs as a member of the White House team.

The investigation found "no basis" on which to prosecute Meese for criminal wrongdoing. So, it is fairly certain Meese will not be cracking rocks in a federal penitentiary.

But does a clean bill of health from a special procesutor mean that Meese is entitled to serve as U.S. attorney general, as the highest ranking law enforcement official in the land? That is a quantum leap we wish the Senate did not have to consider.

Serious ethical questions remain. These are questions not covered by the letter of the law by which special prosecutors are constrained.

Reports this week revealed that staff members in the Office of Government Ethics concluded that Meese had violated federal ethics rules on at least two occasions. In one instance, Meese failed to disclose a $15,000 interest-free loan from a close friend. In another, he played a role in finding jobs for other friends who helped him out of financial straits.

Legal? Perhaps. Ethical? That is at least open to disput—hardly a ringing endorsement of a future attorney general, whose ethics should be beyond reproach.

Meese's credentials in the legal field also leave much to be desired. He once served as an assistant district attorney in California. He was director of the Center for Criminal Justice Policy and Management at the School of Law at the University of California in San Diego before coming to Washington.

Aside from those positions, his primary occupation has been that of politician, chiefly as Ronald Reagan's friend, counsel and confidante.

These factors surely vex many of the senators charged with the task of deciding Meese's fitness to serve as attorney general. Texas' two senators said Tuesday, as hearings before the Judiciary Committee began, that they have not decided whether they will support Meese.

Lloyd Bentsen, a moderate Democrat who rarely votes against presidential nominees, is taking a "wait-and-see" attitude. Even more surprising, GOP. Sen. Phil Gramm, a diehard Reagan loyalist, said he would not make a final decision until he reviews the Judiciary Committee report.

Reagan probably will never withdraw his appointment of Meese. He is as hardheaded as Harry Truman in supporting cronies in key positions. The president's support has remained steadfast during last year's investigation and after the surfacing of the Ethics Office report this week.

Perhaps it's too much to expect that the Senate will reject Meese because his background is tainted and because he lacks the qualities to be anythging more than a mediocre attorney general. But the country and the president would be better served if Reagan would choose another appointee from among the huge pool of qualified legal minds in the country.

[From the Austin (TX) American Statesman, Jan. 31, 1985]

THE FACTS REMAIN: MEESE NOT QUALIFIED FOR AG POST

The Senate hearings this week on the nomination of Edwin Meese to be attorney general probably will break no new ground. The facts are not in dispute. Though a special investigator found no basis for charging Meese with criminal conduct, he clearly has scant sensitivity to or respect for high standards of ethical conduct and his nomination should be rejected.

If the Senate fails to confirm him, it will send a clear message that it expects nominees to such lofty positions as attorney general to be of high quality. "Not actually indicted" just isn't good enough.

But if the Senate confirms the nomination, it could be sending an unfortunately different message. It would be that it finds nothing wrong in Meese's as White House counsel, having appointed to federal office six individuals who personally gave him tens of thousands of dollars in financial assistance or who were officers of a bank that extended him favorable treatment on more than $400,000 in loans; nothing wrong in Meese having received special treatment in being promoted from lieutenant colonel to colonel in the Army Reserve, over the objection of the Army deputy chief of staff; nothing wrong in changing records to show a legally questionable "moving expense" payment as a consulting fee; and nothing wrong with having failed to file complete financial disclosure forms.

Certainly, presidents are entitled to nominees who agree with them philosophically and politically and who are friends. But not when the nominee has an almost total blindness to the sort of ethical standards expected of the nation's top lawyer. There are thousands of better qualified lawyers who also are conservative Republicans and who are rigorously ethical. The Senate should tell President Reagan to find one to nominate as attorney general.

[From the Bakersfield (CA) Californian, Jan. 28, 1985]

OURS—BETTER CANDIDATES EXIST

Edwin Meese III returns to the Senate Judiciary Committee tomorrow for renewed hearings to determine whether the Senate should confirm him as Attorney General. It will be almost a year to the day since earlier hearings were suspended.

The earlier hearings were suspended to allow an independent counsel to investigate whether federal laws had been broken during a complex series of financial transactions entered into by Meese. Questions also were raised about his role in the Reagan campaign's acquisition of a Carter campaign debate briefing book—the overballyhooed "debategate" affair.

After a narrowly conducted five-month investigation, special counsel Jacob Stein concluded that "no basis" had been found "for the bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese for violation of a criminal statute." Stein refused to "comment on Mr. Meese's ethics and the propriety of his conduct or an evaluation of his fitness for office."

We agree that is more appropriate for the Senate to determine than it is for a federal appointee.

We opposed Meese's earlier nomination to succeed William French Smith on two grounds: the questions that had been raised regarding improper actions which he may have taken while a presidential counselor and because we felt that there were better candidates.

We are willing to accept Stein's conclusion that Meese engaged in no criminal actions, even if his actions were indiscreet.

But nothing in the year that has passed between the two rounds of confirmation hearings has convinced us that Meese is the best person available for the job.

Meese is a former Alameda County District Attorney. A staunch conservative—which is not the basis of our objection to him—he has pledged to carry on Reagan administration policies: stronger drug enforcement actions, fighting organized crime and an emphasis on victims of crimes.

As good as that sounds, he has also said things which give us pause, such as chacterizing the American Civil Liberties Union as being a part of a national crime lobby, the manner of his support for "preventive detention" and his advocacy of using illegally obtained evidence in trials.

The attorney generalship is one of the country's most sensitive domestically oriented offices. We think there are other persons available who can carry on the president's mandate in a more even-handed way.

[From the Beaver Dam (WI) Daily Citizen, Feb. 1, 1985]

A LESSON FROM MEESE

Twelve months is a long time for a Cabinet appointee to twist in the air. Something beyond mere partisan or ideological wrangling must have held up approval of Edwin Meese III by the Senate Judiciary Committee for that long. The designation of James Baker III, the fellow White House troika alumnus, as secretary of the Treasury took but one day to pass muster in the Senate Finance Committee before being promptly ushered down to the Senate floor for quick approval.

The lesson in the Meese ordeal is that Cabinet appointments should be made in the first instance principally on the basis of professional competence and probity, not on the basis of personal loyalty to the president, reward for longtime service, or the desire to reassure a political constituency that its support will not be forgotten. This is especially true of the post of attorney general, whose officeholder might have to confront the chief executive with unwelcome, impartial counsel.

The Meese appointment bore too heavy a personal weight. No acclamation of his impersonal competence by legal professionals came to his rescue. The conventional notion that a president should be able to appoint the people he wants played too strongly in the initial Meese decision. Once launched, the appointment ensured a personal ordeal for Mr. Meese and his family, an embarrassing loose end for President Reagan through the last election, and the prospect that Meese would have a harder time winning the confidence of the American people by his performance on the job, given the long public attack on his fitness.

That public confidence is important. The designers of the process would not have required Senate approval if a president's imprimatur on an appointment were enough.

The remarkable hiatus stemmed largely from reservations about Mr. Meese's ethical fitness for the job. It has all been gone over so many times that perhaps his supporters hoped that familiarity with the charges would make them seem less offensive. These include instances of financial assistance to Meese or his wife by individuals who later won government posts with his help, a preferential advance in Meese's Army Reserve status, and a record of testimony that showed a disconcerting imprecision in his recall of events and in the orderliness of his private affairs. A court-appointed independent counsel, Jacob A. Stein, found that Meese had committed no criminal actions. In recent days, an Office of Government Ethics staff report was made public. The report, rejected by the office's director, accused Meese of violating federal ethical standards.

In his defense, Mr. Meese ascribes his problems to disorder and haste in the early days of the Reagan administration, not to self-seeking, and he promises greater sensitivity to the appearances of confict of interest in the future.

Another line of reservations about Meese derives from this views and actions on civil rights, on legal services for the poor, and other matters that could come into his domain for action as attorney general. Unfortunately, inquiry into these issues had to struggle for equal footing with the ethics question.

The sense in Washington for weeks now has been that Meese would eventually weather the assault on his nomination. But more-exacting attention to ethical principles in the White House four years ago would perhaps have eliminated the apparent conflicts of interest. And a more impersonal search for someone to fill the nation's top law enforcement office could also have given the Senate approval process a more affirmative ring than has been heard in the Meese case the past dozen months. THE MEESE WHITEWASH

President Reagan has nominated for attorney general his White House counsel, Edwin Meese, who has a bad habit of getting financial favors from people who end up with cushy government jobs. The coincidences were striking enough to prompt the appointment last year of an independent counsel, who came to the conclusion that there wasn't enough hard evidence to justify a criminal indictment.

That's reassuring, but it doesn't answer the question at hand; whether Mr. Meese has the ethical sensitivity that the Senate should expect of a person asking to be confirmed as head of the Department of Justice. Therefore it is gratifying to know that Mr. Meese's ethics—and not just his criminal liability—have been addressed by the Office of Government Ethics.

The staff of that agency studied the report of the independent counsel and came to the conclusion that, in two matters, Mr. Meese's financial dealings had, in fat, appeared to conflict with his official duties. This is a violation of federal regulations which forbid actions by officials that might even "create the appearance of" preferential treatment for someone.

This clear statement of some of the issues involved in the Meese appointment was almost not available to the Senate Judiciary Committee as it begins what its Republican chairman, Strom Thurmond, has said will be just a one-day, hurry-up confirmation hearing of Mr. Meese. The contents of the report were kept under wraps by the Office of Government Ethics' director, David H. Martin, after he was persuaded by Mr. Meese's attorneys and White House officials not to take action on the staff's findings. The report saw the light of day only after it was leaked to The Wall Street Journal.

There are no damning new revelations in the document. All that the staff's attorneys did was to study the independent counsel's record, examine the pertinent federal regulations and come to a conclusion that should have been obvious to the Senate: Mr. Meese has not met the minimum standard for conduct by government officials or employees. The advantage of having this report on the table is that it forces senators to recognize just what they will be condoning if they give their blessings to this unworthy nomination.

[From the Bethlehem (PA) Globe-Times, Jan. 29, 1985]

CONFIRMATION OF MEESE WILL SEND WRONG MESSAGE

Most Washington insiders expect the U.S. Senate will confirm White House Counselor Edwin Meese III's appointment as U.S. attorney general. Normally, the president is given his choice on such appointments. If it happens in this case, however the senators will have sent a troubling message about the state of our public ethics.

An independent counsel who investigated charges against Meese found there was insufficient evidence for prosecuting him. This is being interpreted as a clean bill of health, justifying speedy confirmation. In fact, the independent counsel's 385-page report is anything but vindication. It contains detailed, largely uncontested evidence of Meese's own low regard for ethics in government, and of his willingness to engage in behavior that raises the most serious questions about his fitness to become our country's chief law-enforcement officer.

Meese secured federal appointments for several people from whom he borrowed money or was helped financially, in some cases with no interest charged, and in one case failing to report the loan as required by law. The independent counsel said he could not prove the people won the jobs because of the financial relationship. But the counsel explicitly left it to others to determine whether Meese had adhered to standards of ethics and propriety required to head the Department of Justice.

In the past, receiving personal financial benefits, as Meese did, and then exercising governmental power in favor of the benefactor has been condemned as grossly unethical—even when there was no proof of a causal connection.

When it became known that Sherman Adams, the senior White House aide to President Dwight D. Eisenhower, had accepted a vicuna coat, the loan of an expensive oriental rug and the payment of his hotel bills from a textile executive who had matters pending before other departments of the government, Adams was forced to resign, even though he had committed no crime.

When it became known that Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas accepted a gift of $20,000 from financier Louis Wolfson and agreed to accept annual retainers, Fortas, too, was forced to resign, even though he neither gave nor promised official favors.

Even if an official can maintain complete impartiality, the sight of a government official using his office to help or simply to deal with individuals who have done him financial favors undermines public confidence in government. Free government cannot survive that loss of confidence.

In particular, the attorney general has more opportunity to set the ethical tone of an administration than any official other than the president. He must symbolize the fair-minded, impartial, sensitive but impersonal administration of justice. Organized society depends on a wide network of obligations that cannot be enforced by criminal punishment but that must be honored by most of us if we are to remain a free society.

One tangible result of confirmation would be to lower ethical standards for government workers throughout the nation. As Archibald Cox, the respected attorney, professor and former Watergate Special Prosecutor, has noted, a vote to confirm Meese would say to thousands of government officials and employees:

"We, United States Senators, think that anyone in public office should feel free to accept large financial favors. Don't worry that those who do you a favor may later look for government appointments or have business with the government that you may affect. Don't even worry about later participating in their appointment, or their receipt of other government benefits. We, as Senators, see nothing wrong in this. Just be sure not to commit a crime."

[From the Biloxi-Gulfport (MS) Daily Herald, Jan. 29, 1985]

MEESE PASSING LEGAL BILL TO TAXPAYERS

Until he tried to pass on his $720,000 legal bill to the taxpayers, Ed Meese seemed assured that the senate would approve his nomination to be the U.S. attorney general. Now it appears that if anything convinces the senate to withhold its approval, it will be this newest controversy over how much of Meese's legal bills should be paid by the taxpayers.

The Meese-for-attorney general story is as long as it is messy. Had the legal payment question not surfaced, the probability is that this week's Senate Judiciary Committee hearings would have ended it with a cleared path to Senate confirmation. After all, senators are considering a nomination from a president with a 49-state landslide re-election—that's high-powered political clout.

But the legal payments issue is a substantial one. Ironically, it stems from the services of the very people who successfully defended their client during a detailed investigation last year, his lawyers Leonard Garment and E. Robert Wallach. They are not your everyday attorneys; when they work, they command fees of $250 an hour.

In the Meese case, the tab for their legal services ran up to $720,000. That's twice as much as the federal government spent for the lawyers who conducted the investigation.

The law that created the special prosecutor also allows a public official who has been investigated and cleared to have his reasonable legal fees paid for by the government. Meese's case raises the question "What is reasonable?" A panel of three circuit judges will have to answer that question. If they find that "reasonable" fees would be an amount equal to what the government spent on the case, Meese would face a $400,000 bill, steep by any standards and almost impossible for someone whose annual salary is $80,000.

If Garment and Wallach charge less than their regular fees, Meese would be receiving a substantial financial favor. If friends raise the difference between what the government would pay and what he owes, he and they would be violating a statute that forbids paying a supplement to his federal salary.

It is ironic that Meese has helped lead the administration's fight to end free federal legal services for the poor and to limit private attorneys who beat the government in court to fees of $75 an hour.

Meese survived a five-month investigation headed by Jacob Stein, the Independent Counsel who looked into numerous charges leveled at Meese last year. Stein studied 11 charges, including the connection between Meese's acceptance of financial favors and his help in appointing his benefactors to high-level federal positions.

Stein's conclusion was that there was "no basis" for prosecuting Meese under federal criminal law, but his report was far from an exoneration. The conduct revealed by the investigation may not have merited criminal prosecution but it certainly did not describe the qualifications that ought to be required of the person who would be the chief law enforcement official of the nation and its highest legal officer.

It has only been a few years since that office was tarnished by John Mitchell's involvement in Watergate. Citizens look to the Senate to assure that candidates for that office meet the high ethical standards.

Meese's standards seemed less than adequate before. Sticking taxpayers with his $720,000, or trying to, does nothing to elevate them.

[From the Bradenton (FL) Herald, Feb. 1, 1985]

CLEARED, BUT UNQUALIFIED

". . . since when is not being indicted a qualification for a Cabinet post?" asks Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, one of the few members of the Senate Judiciary Committee who has publicly opposed Edwin Meese III's confirmation as attorney general. Metzenbaum was referring to the shaky logic used to support Meese's confirmation during Senate hearings this week: Since Meese has been cleared of criminal wrongdoing, the theory goes, there is no reason not to make him the most powerful law officer in the nation.

Metzenbaum and others who oppose Meese's confirmation have one insurmountable reason why he should not be attorney general—he is guilty of unethical, if not illegal, conduct. His failure to live up to the ethical standards expected of federal servants proves that he is a particularly unacceptable candidate to lead the nation's criminal justice system.

When Meese's confirmation was opposed last spring, independent counsel Jacob A. Stein was appointed to investigate charges that Meese had unethically and illegally won administration jobs for individuals who did him financial favors. In September, Stein concluded that Meese had done nothing to violate federal criminal laws. The Reagan administration joined Meese in pronouncing the report a complete vindication, without mentioning that Stein had refused to comment in his report on charges that Meese had acted unethically.

Meese claimed the report "left no stone unturned" to prove his ethical as well as legal innocence. But slimy signs of ethical misconduct by Meese have nevertheless surfaced this week, via a report from the Office of Government Ethics. The internal report by staff lawyers F. Gary Davis and Nancy Feathers, which concludes that Meese violated ethical standards required of federal employees, was suppressed by office chief David H. Martin. It saw the light of day this week, after Senate Judiciary Committee members learned of the report's existence and demanded to see it.

The report states that Meese violated an ethics rule that limits federal employees' ability to accept gifts, and a rule intended to protect federal servants from conflicts of interest. It refers to a $60,000 loan Meese received with the help of his accountant John R. McKean, who was later nominated to a seat on the U.S. Postal Board of Governors. Meese also created, at the very least, the appearance of impropriety when he accepted help in the sale of his California home from Thomas J. Barrack Jr., who was later given a job in the Interior Department.

These incidents show, at best, Meese's disregard for ethics. Even if Meese did not intentionally abuse his influence for personal gain, the conflict of interest has undermined public faith in his ability to handle the power and responsibilities of attorney general fairly and intelligently.

Added to Meese's misjudgments his latest affront—asking the government to pay $720,924 in legal fees for $250-an-hour lawyers he hired to defend his past conduct. Under certain circumstances, federal employees are entitled to receive reimbursement for legal fees for private lawyers. But Meese's lawyers exceeded the Reagan Justice Department's policy of limiting federal employees' private attorney fees to $75 an hour. Not only is it hypocritical of Meese, an opponent of free legal services for the poor, to expect taxpayers to foot the bill for his high-priced legal help; it is a violation of the Justice Department's own code. That Meese has once again disregarded rules set by the administration he serves is another indication that he is not fit to lead the justice system.

Common Cause chairman Archibald Cox, an outspoken opponent of the expected Meese confirmation, maintains that Meese's insensitivity to the standards expected of an attorney general "would disqualify even a lawyer of broad legal experience and high legal attainments. Mr. Meese has neither."

What Mr. Meese does have is the support of the president—and good reason to believe he will become attorney general. President Reagan has chosen and defended some woefully unqualified and combative officials in the past—James Watt and Anne Burford being the worst of the lot—who have done the nation and the Reagan administration far more harm than good. Surely he could have found a more qualified, less controversial candidate for attorney general than Edwin Meese. Americans have a right to expect much more from their attorney general than the absence of a criminal record.

[From the Brattleboro (VT) Reformer, Jan. 30, 1985]

THE MEESE APPROACH TO GOVERNMENT ETHICS

President Reagan gets his way with a lot of things on Capitol Hill these days, as befitting one of the most popular presidents in modern history, and he probably will get his way with the Edwin Meese nomination. The Republicans control the Senate, and senators of all persuasions always are reluctant to reject a presidential Cabinet appointment.

But in the Meese case, that's too bad. It is unfortunate that President Reagan still insists that he be attorney general.

As attorney generals normally go, Meese probably wouldn't be all that bad. He is not even close to being as awful as John Mitchell, who was Richard Nixon's attorney general, and who is now an ex-jailbird because of his sleaze role in Watergate. Meese is a conservative, which is hardly anything to hold against him, and he is loyal to the President, as all good attorneys general should be.

Nevertheless, the nation's chief law enforcement officer should be a man above reproach, and Meese is not. Compared to Robert Kennedy, for example—who is the subject of a current television mini-series—

Meese falls short not only on ability and compassion, but integrity.

This really is the issue in the Meese controversy. Jacob Stein, the independent counsel who investigated allegations that Meese aided friends in return for loans, found no legal wrong-doing. But the question is not criminal activity, or the lack of it; it is Meese's ethical behavior in government.

One report by staff lawyers for the Office of Government Ethics has concluded that while Meese didn't violate the law, he did violate ethical standards in his conduct while in the White House. That report is now figuring prominently in the Senate Judiciary Committee confirmation hearings on Meese that got underway yesterday.

Meese's problem is compounded by the job he is seeking. The "Justice" Department, by any standard, should be as clean as a hound's tooth owned by Caesar's wife. The attorney general should not be tainted by even the hint of scandal. If a special counsel has to be chosen to investigate allegations of impropriety, as was the case with Meese, that in and of itself should be enough to disqualify any prospective head of the Justice Department. It's bad enough that the Reagan administration's secretary of labor, Raymond Donovan, is actually under indictment; it is even worse that Justice now be tainted.

Over and above all this is Meese's demand that the Reagan administration—the nation's taxpayers, in short—pay the staggering $725,000 in legal fees that were run up by two private lawyers who represented him during the government's investigation of his activities. That princely sum came about because the two princely attorney's charged him $250 an hour. Even so, three-quarters of a million dollars is an outrageous amount of money for taxpayers to spend either on Ed Meese or on his lawyers.

All of this is even more outrageous, of course, because it was Meese who has led the battle to limit to $75 an hour the fees of private attorneys who beat the government in court. And it was Meese who has helped lead the Reagan administration's drive to prevent free legal services for the poor.

Rich lawyers, in short, protect and enhance other rich lawyers. And if that is the Meese concept of "justice" in American society, then there is ample reason to reject his nomination, even forgetting his footloose and fancy approach to ethics in government.

[From the Camarillo (CA) Daily News, Jan. 30, 1985]

GOOD "CRONY-GENERAL"

Archibald Cox, the high-minded Watergate prosecutor, says Ed Meese is unfit to be U.S. attorney general.

He's right, but not necessarily for the reasons he cites.

Cox is most concerned about Meese's "utter insensitivity to ethical standards."

That's a valid point. When ethics were ladled out, Meese was playing golf. But Washington's hide is well-scarred with character lapse.

Even more to the point in the Meese nomination are his professional qualifications.

To say the kindest, they are modest.

Meese was deputy district attorney of Alameda County and he directed a Center for Criminal Justice Policy at a San Diego law school.

That's it, so far as law goes. Yet he is slated to be our top law official.

We have hundreds of men and women who are better grounded in law and the Constitution. No, we have thousands.

Meese is a businessman, troubleshooter and politician. He also is a good buddy of the president.

He qualifies to be "crony-general," as the Chicago Tribune puts it. But is good buddyism the way to pick cabinet officials?

[From the Carrollton (GA) Times-Georgian, Feb. 2, 1985]

THE ARROGANT MR. MEESE

The whole Ed Meese affair is beginning to have a very bad taste in the mouths of Americans. Southerners, especially, dislike arrogant politicians. And there are legions of them in the Reagan administration. Meese has demonstrated amply during his confirmation hearings that he is of the same holy cloth as his fellow snobs in the administration.

We'll grant you there will never, never come to light any actual wrongdoing by the presidential counselor. But the confirmation hearings have shown there exists the very distinct probability that there was unethical conduct on his part in his past political dealings.

And now the news becomes known that Meese, who has worked hard for four years to kill the federal legal services program for the poor, is billing the government for more than $700,000 to pay his lawyers.

That's within the law. The legislation that set up the process under which the misconduct charges against Meese were investigated provides for such reimbursement if the subject of the charges is cleared. In Meese's case, however, there are some questions about the amount. The Reagan administration has been trying to limit reimbursement of lawyers in similar cases to a rate of $75 an hour. Meese's lawyers are billing at $225 an hour, the going rate in leading Washington firms.

That $700,000 would support one fair-sized legal services office with 15 lawyers and supporting staff for a year. Somebody ought to ask him how he feels about legal services now—for the poor, and for Ed Meese.

The more shenanigans that come to light about Mr. Meese, the more some people are inclined to wonder whether this man—even if he is qualified—deserves to be attorney general of the United States. We need no more embarrassment in that high office.

MEESE'S ETHICS

The question before the United States Senate is whether Edwin Meese is competent to become the nation's attorney general. President Reagan has appointed Meese, an old California crony with scant qualifications, for the job.

Certainly from all the possibilities, the White House could have found a better man. Meese simply doesn't fit the bill.

True, a special prosecutor found no evidence to warrant criminal charges against him. But the man's ethics are quite another story. All kinds of questionable dealings have come to the surface against him; Meese was shown to have engaged in dubious transactions of all kinds. His fitness will be closely examined by the Senate Judiciary Committee as a result.

Various groups and individuals have questioned Meese's judgment and will have him on the griddle in the hearings.

As Republican leader of the Senate, Bob Dole of Kansas will be charged with carrying the ball for the White House on the nomination.

Dole thus has an unpleasant duty, and as a loyal Republican, doesn't have much choice unless the evidence against Meese is overwhelming. In that case the president should withdraw the nomination.

The Senate usually accepts presidential nominations, even if it holds its collective nose while doing so. That's an old Senate habit.

The Senate still has a duty to look closely at Meese because the attorney general is a sensitive cabinet position, even when there are no doubts around.

MEESE'S REFUND REQUEST SHOWS HE'S UNFIT FOR POST

One more reason has been added to an already formidable list of reasons why Edwin Meese should not be confirmed as the next attorney general of the United States.

Meese already was under fire from former U.S. Solicitor General Archibald Cox as "unfit to be attorney general" because of his repeated acts "in violation of the ethical standards that should have governed his conduct."

That statement came from Cox after Meese had survived an investigation that found there was no basis for prosecuting Meese for violation of any federal criminal statute.

Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, urged his committee colleagues to reject the Meese nomination "unless political cronyism and ethical blindness are prerequisites for the position."

Cox and Metzenbaum and other Meese critics take the position that the top legal officer of the nation should not just be able to avoid indictment but should be clean as a hound's tooth.

The additional reason for the Senate committee to think long and hard before confirming Meese stems from the atrocious judgment Meese has displayed in trying to get the taxpayers to pick up the tab for his $720,000 in legal fees.

Since Meese was certified as non-indictable, he is entitled to ask that he be reimbursed for what it cost him to prove himself so.

The special prosecutor act allows officials who are cleared to apply to a three-judge court for reimbursement of some of their legal fees.

But the embarrassment here is that Meese's bill was more than twice what it cost the government to investigate him, with his two lead attorneys billed at a rate of $250 an hour.

The U.S. Justice Department, where Meese would preside if confirmed, is vigorously opposing the Meese request for full reimbursement.

Washington observors doubt that the full payment will be approved by the Court of Appeals, and speculate that they might approve a payment to equal the government's cost of $320,000.

That would leave Meese with a number of not very comfortable options.

If his lawyers settle for half, it could raise some serious questions about possible initial overbilling.

If his lawyers agree to let him pay the additional $400,000 after he leaves office there might be some serious problems with the Internal Revenue Service.

And if he tried to pay it himself on his $80,000 a year Cabinet salary, the already heavily mortgaged Meese might well find it impossible.

51-059 O-86-39 (Pt. 2)

As we have said previously, there are men and women available for this appointment who meet the requirements for the chief legal officer of this nation, but, unfortunately, Edward Meese is not one of them.

His confirmation appears likely because the president has so far refused to budge from backing his long-time crony.

But it will be a shame if it happens.

MEESE WRONG FOR JOB

Presidental adviser Edwin Meese may have been cleared of criminal wrongdoing with respect to the many questionable financial and political activities he has engaged in since coming to Washington four years ago, but that does not mean he is qualified to hold the important, and highly sensitive, position of United States attorney general.

Serious ethical questions remain in connection with Mr. Meese, and the Senate Judiciary Committee, which on Tuesday opened hearings on his nomination, ought to have been reminded of that by the reports this week that an Office of Government Ethics staff report concluded that he had violated federal ethics rules on at least two occasions.

President Reagan contends that Mr. Meese, a longtime friend and political associate, was "vindicated" last September when special prosecutor Jacob A. Stein found no basis for filing official charges against him. Perhaps. But that hardly makes him a good choice to serve as the nation's top law enforcement officer. In truth, Mr. Meese is a poor choice: He has not demonstrated that he has either the moral character or the legal experience needed to carry out the important duties of attorney general in a professional, equitable and ethical fashion.

Although Mr. Stein found no grounds on which to prosecute, he delivered a 385-page report on Mr. Meese's activities that raises substantial questions about his fitness as a lawyer and a public servant. We agree with Common Cause chairman Archibald Cox, a special prosecutor himself during the Watergate era, who said, "It is not enough for someone to be attorney general to have a sign saying, 'I've been found not to be a crook.'" Mr. Cox charged that the attorney general-designate had displayed a "lack of ethical sensitivity" and a "blindness to abuse of position" in some of his dealings.

While serving as counselor to the President, for example, Mr. Meese failed to disclose a $15,000 interest-free loan from a close friend and played a role in obtaining federal jobs for friends who had helped him out of financial troubles. He also managed to obtain a promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve even though he didn't have the qualifications to merit the promotion.
